A number of measures have been introduced in Congress to regulate the cold-storage business, but the bill offered by Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, is receiving most of the attention. The feature of this bill is that it limits the period of storage. It would make the maximum period of storage on beef or its products seven months; veal, two months; pork, four months; sheep or goats, four months; lambs or kids, three months; poultry and game, three months; fish, two months; eggs, three months to six months, with provision for labeling all over three months old after inspection; butter, three months. The bill proposes that cold-storage articles must be labeled with the dates of production, killing, packing, or manufacturing, and period of storage. It would bar thawing out cold-storage products, would have regulations issued by the Department of Ariculture, and provides other precautions.

After providing against long storage of foodstuffs, the bill provides that packers of meat, poultry, butter, and eggs, and all cold-storage concerns must furnish to the Government daily statements of goods on hand, shipments, receipts, and deliveries, in violation of which fines ranging from $100 to $1,000 or prison sentence not exceeding five years may be imposed.

At present there is no Federal law regulating the period of storage. Dealers and cold-storage men can enforce a condition of scarcity at any time by manipulating the markets. Any unconscionable and far-sighted person can rig up a corner on a foodstuff by storing it, and he invariably takes enough toll from the public to pay him well for the trouble.

There isn't going to be any cold-storage regulation without a fight. The cold-storage interests are organized for the fray. And, of course, they have a side of the story, too, that will have to be heard and pondered before action is taken.

MORE INVESTIGATION.

The cold-storage interests, in their relations to the food supply and as affecting the high cost of living, are attracting much attention and discussion of late. A few days ago the Times published an editorial upon the subject of "Eggs" and their connection with these interests and the enormous quantity that had been accumulated in the cold-storage depots; and mention was made in that article of a bill that had been prepared for introduction in Congress for the purpose of checking the evil of piling up articles of food in these depots to such an extent as to affect the prices in the markets prejudicially to the welfare of the people.

One of the Representatives in the lower House who proposes to take a leading part in this legislative movement is Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee. He has already announced that just as soon as Congress convenes next week he will demand action toward an investigation of the entire subject of cold storage, with especial reference to its bearing upon the prices of food.

Congressman MCKELLAR has been engaged for some time in the collection of evidence to show that the food markets are being manipulated by the cold-storage interests and that the direct result has been that food has been rendered more expensive to the people than it would otherwise have been. An instance of the methods pursued by the boosters of prices is related in the destruction of an entire carload of eggs for the purpose of decreasing the visible supply and thus producing a rise in prices.

Mr. MCKELLAR says:

"It is bad enough to gamble on poker, horse races, cotton futures, and the like, when you go into the gamble with your eyes open and both sides know what they are doing, but when a few men get together and corner the market on the necessaries of life, without the knowledge and consent of the people they rob, it is certainly carrying the thing too far. Food gambling can not be excused on any ground."

THE EVILS OF COLD STORAGE.

It seems evident that cold storage is going to play quite a part at the present session of Congress. Several Members of the House of Representatives have interested themselves in the subject, but the bill which has the backing of the Department of Justice and which is attracting the most attention is the one introduced by Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR has taken the lead in the House in urging legislation to remedy abuses which he believes have a direct bearing on the high cost of foodstuffs, and it is known that he expects the administration to support his bill, which was referred to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The measure aims to prohibit interstate shipment of certain food products and the transportation and sale of others adulterated or misbranded and to regulate cold storage.

The bill provides that certain articles of food held in cold storage for longer periods than those fixed shall be deemed adulterated and their shipment prohibited in interstate commerce.

With respect to eggs, those held in cold storage not less than three months or more than six months may not be classed as adulterated if, upon inspection, they are found to be sound and wholesome and are stamped or labeled "second period cold-storage eggs."

This stamp is to be on the container from which the eggs are sold and in plain view of the purchaser. Any article of food that has also been in cold storage is to be deemed to be misbranded if the package fails to bear a label plainly stating the date of production, killing, packing, or manufacturing of the product, and the period it has been in cold storage.

Those guilty of misbranding or adulterating any food product would be subject on conviction to a fine of not less than $500 or over $5,000 and to a sentence of from 6 months to 10 years' imprisonment. The penalty for any agreement by which food products are kept in cold storage for a longer or shorter period, or are to be sold or withheld from sale for the purpose of affecting prices is to be from $1,000 to $10,000 combined with 1 to 10 years in prison. Furthermore such agreement for withholding food products from sale to affect prices is prohibited.

While all the blame for the high cost of living can not be placed on cold storage, it is beyond dispute that the plants enable the people who have corners on certain goods to keep up the prices. It is to be hoped that the Federal Government and the State governments can enact laws that will do much toward lessening the evils laid at the door of the cold-storage plants.

FEDERAL VINDICATION OF THE EGG TRUST.

The Department of Agriculture is disposed to vindicate the Cold Storage Trust. Its experts insist that the high price of eggs is caused by the wet and cold spring and the dry July of this year, which slowed up the laying season, but that the pullets have now begun to attend to business and eggs are already cheaper. Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, very pertinently wants to know how the department, which was unable to give him information about the egg production this year compared with that of previous years, managed to get inside statistics on the doings of the pullets for the past two weeks. The Senator's skepticism will be shared by the consumer.

[Cleveland Plain Dealer, Dec. 10, 1913.]

COLD-STORAGE REGULATION.

The Plain Dealer is in receipt of a letter from an East Cleveland reader who protests against further "agitation against storage eggs." "If ever a woman had to study hard on home finances, I had to do so," she writes, relating how she had to support a family by her own resources. "I have depended on eggs to give nourishment; without storage eggs my children would have been denied this nourishment in the winter months, for the price of strictly fresh is beyond our means."

At no time has the Plain Dealer agitated against cold storage or its products. So far as it has taken any part in the current discussion, it has merely advocated measures which should protect the buyers of these products from artificially raised prices on the one hand and from dangerous deterioration in the products on the other.

Most legislative proposals touching the subject have proposed, first, that eggs should be dated when placed in storage and, second, that their sale after a certain period in storage should be prohibited. The measure in Congress proposes to prohibit the interstate shipment of storage products which have not conformed to such requirements.

Our East Cleveland friend, who relies on storage eggs because she can not afford fresh ones, would find protection, not hardship, in such regulatory laws as proposed. When buying she would know accurately just when the eggs were put in storage and could not, therefore, be overcharged. Nor could an unscrupulous dealer sell her storage eggs, claiming they were fresh.

It is primarily for the protection of such people as the writer of this letter that more stringent cold-storage regulation is proposed. The public has tired of what it believes to be the exactions of cold-storage men. No right-thinking person would for a moment suggest anything unjust to the owners of storage warehouses. All that is asked is a square deal all around.

[Cincinnati Globe and Commercial, Dec. 1, 1913.]

AGAINST COLD-STORAGE EXACTIONS.

The revolt of American housewives against the exactions of the cold-storage system has reached Cleveland. A league has been organized with branches in all principal centers. It proposes to study possible methods for combating high prices; one particular object is to help the Federal Government pry into the activities of the so-called cold-storage "combine."

KENNETH DOUGLAS MCKELLAR, Representative in Congress from the tenth Tennessee district, has introduced a measure to regulate the interstate shipment of storage products. This the housewives' leagues of other cities have indorsed. In the same connection Attorney General McReynolds announced the other day that he proposed to investigate the cold-storage men.

Here are two definite points upon which the housewives, organized or unorganized, may center their efforts to relieve conditions admittedly bad. They may boost the McKellar bill; they may lend whatever assistance possible to help the Department of Justice get at the real inside of the storage situation. Whether a boycott on cold-storage products is wise or could be efficacious is quite another question.

Regulation of cold storage is properly a national rather than a State matter. Various States have undertaken something of the kind, but it is doubtful if any appreciable advantage has been obtained. Trade knows no State lines, and it is just as bad for Ohio to eat bad eggs stored in New York as it is to eat bad eggs stored in Ohio. Congress can best handle the evil.

If, however, Congress refuses to act, or until it acts, State legislatures might well pass laws designed to protect their people against the exactions of cold-storage men. A definite time limit should be placed upon the storage of food. Some regulation is needed requiring that storage products be marked to distinguish them from fresh. These two objects are sought by the McKellar bill, the aim of which will meet very general approval.

[Cincinnati Commercial-Tribune, Dec. 2, 1913.]

CONTROL COLD STORAGE.

Federal and State control of food products held in cold storage is contemplated by a bill introduced by Representative MCKELLAR, of Memphis. An exchange comments:

"It forbids the transportation in interstate commerce of food products that have been in storage more than 90 days. It is likely that the bill will be amended if it is passed, but the basic idea is widely commended. A number of the States have established time limits to the storage of foodstuffs.

"Pennsylvania storage houses are to be required to rid themselves of 9,000,000 eggs before December 1. But the price of eggs in Pennsylvania cities is not falling as that period approaches. It is supposed that the egg dealers will ship eggs into other States.

"The objects of the McKellar bill are to give the States adequate control of cold-storage foodstuffs.

"The time limit on the storage of eggs is not the same as on the storage of other foodstuffs, and it may be found necessary to give the subject detailed and scientific study in order that the Federal legislation may point the way for model regulation in the States and may not unduly hamper the interstate trade in foodstuffs. One of the needs of the country is a model storage law which all the States might adopt and which the Federal Government could support through its control of interstate commerce."

[New York Produce News.]

BIG MEAT PACKERS PLAN MONOPOLY OF EGGS AND POULTRY—SWIFT & CO. ALONE CARRIED MORE EGGS IN STORAGE THIS YEAR THAN ANY 50 OF THEIR COMPETITORS, EDITOR OF PRODUCE JOURNAL DECLARES—SMALLER COMMISSION MEN UNABLE TO COMPETE WITH BIG CONCERNS EITHER IN BUYING OR SELLING.

It is openly talked of in the egg business that the big meat packers intend to monopolize it entirely, and not only the egg business but the poultry, butter, and cheese business besides. At least that is the opinion of H. L. Preston, sr., editor of the Produce News.

"The meat packers intend, as sure as daylight, to monopolize the entire egg, poultry, butter, and cheese business, and this in flagrant violation of the Sherman law," Mr. Preston said to-day. "This is the talk of the produce business. Every one in the business knows about it, and they are inclined to believe it. And why shouldn't they be? The business of Swift & Co. this year alone exceeds anything ever known by private jobbers before. They alone carried more eggs than any 50 other operatives.

"The intention of the Meat Trust, according to men in the produce business, is to pool together, in combination in restraint of trade, and corner all of the warehouses of any size in the United States in order to control absolutely the entire output of perishable meat products in this country.

"After they have their talons on the warehouses they will run the small jobbers and private operatives out of business. Any man who wants to store perishable food products will have to apply to the meat industry for space in the cold-storage plants. It would be easy for the Meat Trust either to run the rates up so high on the commission merchant that he could not afford to store, or else to say to him they had filled the plant to capacity, and thus exclude him from any opportunity to store his goods.

"INTERESTED IN BANKS.

"Furthermore, the Meat Trust in every big city is interested in one or more banks which make a business of loaning money on stored goods. Through the connection of these banks with the Money Trust they so control credit as to make it impossible for any little operative to obtain credit on goods in storage unless they are willing that he should have credit. If credit is refused to the small operative, it is easy to see that he will soon be driven out of business.

"Of course, his action would be a flagrant violation of the Sherman antitrust law, but the actions of Swift & Co., of Armour & Co., of Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, and of Morris & Co. this year certainly show a direct effort to restrain trade."

"Can you prove that?" asked the reporter.

"Certainly," responded Mr. Preston. "Here is the proof: In every favorable egg-producing district in the United States Armour, Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, Morris & Co., and Swift open buying plants for eggs in April. The finest eggs in the country for storage purposes are what is known in the trade as 'April eggs'; that is to say, the eggs that are laid between the 1st of April and the middle of May. The condition of the hen is such that the albumen is firmer and the egg stores better.

"In April the big meat men go into the markets and insist upon getting eggs. They buy them at any old price, probably so high that the average commission merchant is left out entirely. In other words, at the initial point in the storage business the meat packers force the price up above the point where the average commission man considers it safe to store.

"They are able to do this because they own great private storehouses in Kansas City, in Chicago, and in St. Louis, and they ship the eggs direct to their own storage houses, where the cost of storage to them is not more than 15 cents, and is probably about 10 cents, whereas the commission merchant, if he took the eggs to the public storage house, would be charged at least 30 cents, and probably 40. That is why the meat men are able to shove the price up at the initial point.

"INSPECTORS CAN'T ENTER.

"The price charged to the small commission merchant is from two to four times what it costs the meat packer to store his eggs in his own private storage house, and in addition those private storage houses are not subject to Federal and State inspection. It is as though they were in a private house. The Government officers can not come in and inspect them.

"Now, the April egg is, as a rule, sold in October. (By the way, one of the chief reasons for the high price of eggs this winter is that on account of the heat last July and last August some of the lot of April eggs had to be broken into, and as a result they are not available.) Now, under the law in Illinois, in Chicago eggs do not have to be marked when they go into storage and when they come out. As a result, in Chicago 9-months-old eggs can be foisted on the public as fresh, and the storers can get away with it.

"Swift & Co. have a brand of eggs that they call the Brookfield eggs. These come from Brookfield, Mo., and, as a rule they are shipped in April to Chicago and stored there. Then in October or later they are shipped on to New York in Swift & Co.'s private cold-storage cars and put into a carton here marked Brookfield eggs. They were not stamped when they were put into storage and when they were taken out. If they have a stamp mark it is a deceptive one, stating when they were put into storage in New York State and neglecting the time that they have been stored in Chicago.

"Furthermore, the eggs are brought to New York in private refrigerator cars. These are not inspected unless some one has a complaint to make against their contents. The big meat men are not subject to the same kind of treatment that the small shippers get when a load of their eggs are thrown from one of the cars at the public docks by an inspector.

"TRANSPORTATION IS CHEAPER.

"That's how it is that the big meat men are able to keep the price of eggs up so high while they are making such a handsome profit. The transportation cost is far cheaper for the bulk when they transport, and, besides, the difference between the cost of the storage in the big private plants of the meat men and the public storage houses where the commission men have to go is great enough to afford a handsome profit to anyone. And this is true not of eggs only, but also of poultry, of butter, and of cheese—in short, of all the perishable food products."

[Journal, Lincoln, Nebr., Dec. 10, 1913.]

COLD STORAGE AND EGGS.

As the price of eggs mounts up and up the victims with one accord turn their wrath upon the cold-storage men. The hens have struck. The main supply of eggs is in cold storage, and the price is not modest. An impassioned Congressman speaks of the cold-storage men as "voracious vultures of the market places" and a "plunderbund of food sharks." This is Mr. MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, who has introduced a bill to "put these gamblers out of business." In Chicago, New York, and Kansas City organizations of women are battering at the heads of the cold-storage men with boycotts. It is a hot time for cold storage.

When we go to pay our taxes we abuse the clerk who takes our money. He is no more responsible for the amount of our taxes than the man in the moon, but his is the nearest head, and the majority of us take a whack at it. The cold-storage men, whether they are combined into an egg corner or not, are little more responsible for the high price of eggs than Postmaster Sizer for the price of postage stamps. But they are the collectors of the price, and so they are the recipients of the wrath. Congress ought to know better than to fall into this mistake, but it doesn't seem to.

The price of any article is determined, on the average and in the long run, by the relations of supply and demand. This is true whether the article is monopoly controlled or not. There are a certain number of eggs in existence and being produced. Whether 1 man or 10,000 own these eggs, the average price at which they can be sold to the consumer is the same. Let the monopolist put his price too high, and he will lose because of eggs left unsold and unsalable on his hands. In case of competition there is the same check on high prices, while the price will never go below what, in the judgment of dealers, will be necessary in order to make the eggs move. There are a thousand collateral facts to consider in this connection, but, roughly speaking, what has been said is true. With a given supply and a given demand the price will be the same whether the article is monopolized or not. In his Principles of Economics, Prof. Taussig, of Harvard, says:

"So far as the ordinary course of market prices is concerned, mere cornering has no effect. If supply remains the same, price to consumers will not be more or less because an article is in single hands. Yet the cornerer may make money. The profit is not obtained at the expense of consumers. The question is simply which set of producers or middlemen will accurately gauge the market price of the season and profit accordingly. This is especially true of articles that are in consumable form. * * * The price of these things is settled with much precision by the play of demand and supply—i. e., by marginal utility—and it matters not to the consumer whether that supply be in a single hand or not."

It is only where the monopolist has control of the supply, of the quantity of an article to be produced and marketed, that he can exercise arbitrary power over prices. When the trusts wish to raise prices they shut down a few mills. The cold-storage men have no authority over the hens. They can not say to the farmers' wives, "Set fewer hens next spring in order that eggs may be higher." They must take the supply as it is. The only thing they can do is to equalize the supply throughout the year, or throughout a series of years, if they are allowed to sell eggs after more than a year in storage. The storage man bets that the price of eggs in July, when the market is flooded, is enough lower than it will be in January, when the hens fail, to pay him for storing July eggs for January sale. But for his purchases eggs would have been cheaper last July. But for his sales they would be now even dearer than they are.

Doubtless proper rules and regulations would get us better eggs from cold storage. We are on the wrong scent, however, in holding the cold-storage men responsible for the high prices. Had Congressman MCKELLAR put "these gamblers out of business" a year ago, eggs would probably be a dollar a dozen now.

[Johnson City (Tenn.) Staff.]

M'KELLAR IN ACTION.

Just as the Staff predicted, Congressman MCKELLAR, of the Memphis district, could not restrain his feelings after investigating the Egg Trust. The more he investigated the cold-storage business the madder he got, until finally he addressed his colleagues in Congress on the subject.

"The drastic features of the bill are only aimed at the corrupt and dishonest, at the gamblers, at voracious vultures, who stand around in the market places and reap where they have not sown and fatten on other people's food. I do not believe any Member of this great House will stand up for any such plunderbund of food sharks."

We should say not. The McKellar bill, which would prescribe both prison terms and heavy fines for violation of its provisions, would make it illegal to ship adulterated and misbranded food products in interstate commerce, and limit the periods in which food products may be held in storage without becoming adulterated.

Reviewing the data produced by the Senate committee, which investigated the high cost of living, Mr. MCKELLAR submitted further statistics intended to show that packers and warehousemen corner the markets on foodstuffs deliberately to increase profits. He asserted that these men would insist that the Federal Government should leave the regulation to the States.

"I can not conceive," Mr. MCKELLAR declared, "any greater crime against the public than the cornering of the market on foodstuffs. Almost every housewife in this country is complaining of the high cost of eggs, and we find these gamblers not only cornering the price of eggs and reaping unfair and unjust profits from it, but actually laughing at the public. My bill would put these gamblers out of business and would give the customer a chance."

Profits of from 100 to 200 per cent were made by the "egg kings" on storage eggs, Mr. MCKELLAR asserted.

Good for this young and courageous Congressman from Tennessee. Maybe we will get cheaper eggs long about the time the currency bill is passed.

[Public Ledger, Philadelphia, Dec. 15, 1913.]

COLD STORAGE MUST BE REGULATED.

[Written for the Public Ledger, by Charles H. Lawall, chemist to the Pennsylvania Dairy and Food Department, Philadelphia.]

Cold storage, when subjected to such restrictions as are necessary to protect the public from abuses, is a fundamental necessity of our time. It constitutes a means for effecting a distribution of the overplus of perishable products at certain seasons of the year so as to afford an even supply throughout the entire market year. This is made necessary, not only because of the increasing centralization of population in the large cities, but also because the consuming public demands articles of food at periods of the year when the fresh product is not available.

The practice of storing perishable foods at certain seasons has been carried on from the most remote times. It is only during recent years, since advancement in methods of refrigeration have resulted in the establishing of large cold-storage warehouses for the public storage of foods for a nominal charge, that it has come into public view as one of the possible factors of the increasingly high cost of living.

A few States have passed laws dealing with the subject more or less completely, among them being Pennsylvania. A long-promised attempt at Federal regulation is seen in the bill recently introduced into the House of Representatives at Washington by Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee. This proposed national bill defines and regulates cold storage and establishes periods beyond which no articles shall be held in cold storage, such periods ranging from two months for veal and its manufactured products, to seven months for beef and its manufactured products.

There is no doubt that much opposition to the proposed national law will be centered against the arbitrary establishment of certain periods for storage, after which the food becomes legally unsalable, whether it has become unwholesome or not. It seems both unjust and unnecessary to condemn as unfit for sale food products which are still in a wholesome condition for the alleged reason of preventing speculation in food commodities, with the result of unfairly raising prices. It looks like a confession of weakness of our power to meet and overcome evil conditions to attack them in such a roundabout manner, and it is not at all clear that in order to escape one evil we shall not encounter a greater one, i. e., that of shortage or scarcity at certain times of the year if the maximum periods of cold storage be made too short. It would seem to be to the best interests of the food-consuming public to establish, unify, and enforce both State and national cold-storage laws, particularly along the following lines:

First. The definition of cold storage and cold-storage warehouses so as to include not only public storage plants, where sanitary conditions are usually regulated in accordance with the requirements of keeping products in a condition favorable for resale, but also private refrigerating rooms in hotels, manufacturing establishments, etc., where it is now possible to use up food that is in such a bad condition as to be unsalable unless worked up into other products in such a manner as to disguise its condition.

Second. To provide for the proper inspection of all articles entering and leaving cold storage so as to insure soundness and wholesomeness, both at the time when stored and when withdrawn for sale.

Third. To provide for the periodic inspection of all cold-storage rooms or warehouses and of the products as subsequently found upon the market for sale at retail. This would insure the proper handling of those goods which are well known to be more susceptible to decomposition than the corresponding fresh articles.

Fourth. To provide for the enforcement of labeling regulations for cold-storage foods, which should plainly state for the information of each handler, and especially the consumer, the dates of entry to and withdrawal from cold storage. If this be firmly and rigidly attended to, the time element will largely take care of itself.

Fifth. To provide for the absolute prohibition of the return to cold storage of food once withdrawn from storage for sale.

Sixth. To provide for the keeping of such records and the rendering of such reports as will enable shipments to be traced from the time the article enters cold storage until it is withdrawn for sale.

Seventh. To provide penalties for the violation of any of the sections of the act and for the sale of cold-storage goods as fresh.

If the foregoing underlying principles be rigidly looked after and a maximum period of one year be established for some classes of foods, together with shorter periods for other classes, and the requirement that after a certain time—say three months for eggs and six months for beef—no such article may be removed from storage and sold without inspection and approval of its wholesome condition (or destruction, if found to be unwholesome), the public will be amply protected and the question of speculation and overstorage can be met and overcome in other ways, if necessary.

All of the prejudice concerning the alleged unwholesomeness of cold-storage products is utterly without foundation, if such products are collected, stored, and handled under proper conditions. If laws embodying the features indicated above be enforced, these proper conditions will follow, and cold storage under such regulation will undoubtedly become an important factor in lowering the cost of living instead of raising it.

A consideration of the subject of cold storage would be incomplete without some attention being paid to the egg question. Among the more or less frenzied statements which have lately been made relative to the price of fresh eggs and their apparent scarcity, is that the present high price is due to the Pennsylvania cold-storage act, which is said to have deterred dealers from placing the customary number in storage in the spring. No statement could be more misleading. The number of eggs placed in cold storage has little to do with the price, as is proved by the following extracts from the annual report of the United States Secretary of Agriculture for 1911, in which it is stated that although "The egg year 1910–11 had 29 per cent more eggs in cold storage than the preceding year, at a time when there was a plenty of eggs in storage, the wholesale price of eggs soared to 43 cents in Boston and 45½ cents in New York in November. There was an apparent mistake of the storage men in overestimating the consumption of the public at exorbitant prices, and the storage men dumped on the foreign market the greatest quantity of eggs ever exported from this country in a year."

The present high cost of fresh eggs is due to the fact that formerly any kind of eggs were sold as fresh, while, under the present enforcement of the food laws, they are required to be fresh eggs in fact as well as in name. In corroboration of this point, a grocery-trade paper, published in Philadelphia, contained an editorial recently in which the fact was freely admitted that heretofore any egg that had never been in cold storage was sold as a fresh egg, irrespective of its age (which is frequently from three to six weeks) and lamenting the fact that the majority of such eggs must now be sold simply as "selected" eggs. That this is true may be verified by an inspection of the cartons of eggs sold by most dealers, who formerly called their eggs fresh, and on which the word "fresh" has been replaced by the word "selected," either by the printing of a new carton or by pasting the word "selected" over the former word "fresh."

The correction of an evil of this kind is in the interests of public welfare, and the blame can not be laid upon the cold-storage laws nor upon any other laws, but upon the previous deceptions practiced by the egg dealers themselves.

[Courier, Buffalo, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1913.]

THE M'KELLAR BILL.

Several bills for regulating cold-storage warehouses have been introduced in Congress, but the one that is attracting most attention is that which was prepared by Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, assisted by the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture.

The McKellar bill, which probably will be made the basis of any legislation that Congress may enact, is elaborate and drastic. Its main feature is a provision declaring that certain specified articles of food, which have been held in cold storage beyond certain periods, shall be deemed adulterated, and their shipment in interstate commerce shall be prohibited. For instance, the maximum cold-storage period for beef is seven months; veal, two months; pork, four months; sheep, four months; lamb, three months; game and poultry, three months; fish, two months; eggs, three months; butter, three months.

The bill absolutely prohibits the sale within the United States of any adulterated or misbranded food products as defined in the act. It also prohibits the placing in cold storage of any products that are diseased, unsound, or which are not caught and fed and slaughtered in a sanitary manner.

The penalty for misbranding or adulterating any food product is a fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000 and imprisonment of from 6 months to 10 years. The penalty for any agreement to keep food products in cold storage for a longer or shorter period to affect prices is from $1,000 to $10,000 and imprisonment from 1 to 10 years. The penalty for offering for sale any cold-storage product as a fresh product is a fine from $100 to $1,000 and imprisonment from 3 to 6 months.

Whatever else may be said of the McKellar bill, it can not be rightly charged that it hasn't a full set of teeth.

[The Washington Times, Dec. 19, 1913.]

COLD-STORAGE MEN LINE UP FOR FIGHT—M'KELLAR BILL TO BE OPPOSED BY INTERESTS AT APPROACHING HEARINGS.

Whenever Congress attempts to regulate any of the large special interests there is always an outcry and all manner of difficulties are encountered. This is illustrated in the case of the attempt to regulate the cold-storage business.

Cold-storage interests are planning for the fight of their lives against the McKellar cold-storage bill. It has been determined that hearings on this bill will be deferred until after the holiday recess of Congress. Meantime, the cold-storage interests are organizing to combat the measure and compel its modification.

CHAIRMAN COVINGTON ACTS.

Congressman Covington is chairman of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce, which will hold the hearings. He has announced hearings will be begun the day after the holiday recess ends. When the hearings begin it is the purpose to marshal before the subcommittee packers of beef and of various meats and meat products, fishermen, poultrymen, cold-storage men, and many others interested in handling foodstuffs.

Even some farmers will be arrayed before the committee. It will be urged that the McKellar bill is too drastic and would hurt more than it would help.

The facts respecting the egg will be given special attention. That is, the cold-storage people will endeavor to impress the subcommittee with the idea that they are not to blame for the high prices of eggs. Frank A. Horne, of New York, president of a large cold-storage company, and chairman of the joint committee of the Cold Storage Warehousemen's Association and Affiliated Industries, will be one of the witnesses.

Mr. Horne will deny there is a cold-storage trust or combination and will lay the high prices of eggs to the great flood in the Ohio Valley and the Middle West. He will asseverate that hosts of fowls were drowned, and besides that drought in some of the agricultural States also diminished egg production. He will insist there was a shortage November 1 in the leading cold-storage warehouses of 664,016 cases of eggs, each case containing 30 dozen.

Other testimony will be offered to try to prove that it was the hard hand of nature, not of any cold-storage trust, that made folks go eggless.

In a general way, the cold-storage interests will try to prove that the cold-storage business is beneficent; that the cold-storage men gather up food articles while the supply is redundant and preserve them until the public needs them. It will be especially insisted that the provisions in the McKellar bill limiting the time food articles can be kept in storage are unwise and entirely too short.

In a word, a battle royal is going to be waged. The cold-storage interests are powerful and their ramifications wide. Attempts have been made heretofore to bring about strict regulation, but they have been blocked. Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, while head of the Bureau of Chemistry, fought for regulation, but was beaten.

It remains to be seen what the outcome of the forthcoming fight will be. It is a fact, however, that public sentiment to-day is more fully stirred against all manner of food combines than ever before, and the outcome may be a piece of lawmaking with teeth in it.

ACTS OF VARIOUS STATES RELATING TO COLD STORAGE.

DELAWARE.

Chapter 177.—General provisions respecting trade.

An act relating to cold-storage and refrigerating warehouses and places and the sale or disposition of the food kept or preserved therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware in general assembly met:

SECTION 1. The term food as used in this act shall include any article used for food or drink by man or animal, with the exception that it shall not include and apply to the storing and refrigerating of fruits or of fish.

SEC. 2. It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or in the business of refrigerati , to receive any kind of food, with the exception of fruits and fish, unless the said food or the package containing the same is branded, stamped, or marked in some conspicuous place with the day, month, and year when the same is received for storage or refrigerating.

SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or in the business of refrigerating within the State of Delaware, to permit any article of any kind whatsoever used for food, now in the possession of any person or persons, corporation or corporations, now engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or refrigerating, to be taken from their possession without first having branded, stamped, or marked on said stuffs or the package containing the same, in a conspicuous place, the day, month, and year when said foodstuffs or package was received by any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business aforesaid.

SEC. 4. It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or refrigerating within the State of Delaware, to keep in storage for preservation or otherwise any kind of food or any article used for food for a longer period than six calendar months without the consent granted as hereinafter provided by the board of health having jurisdiction, or its duly authorized agents or officers, or except as hereinafter otherwise provided.

SEC. 5. The State board of health or the local board of health within the limits of any municipal corporation having such local board is vested with full power and authority to inspect and supervise all places in the State of Delaware now used or hereafter to be used for cold-storage or refrigerating purposes; the members of the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid, or the duly authorized agents or employees of said board, shall be permitted access to such place or places and all parts thereof at all times for the purpose of seeing that said place or places are kept and maintained in a clean, sanitary manner, and for the purpose of determining whether or not the provisions of this act or any other act relating to foodstuffs are being complied with. The power of supervision hereby granted shall extend to enable the State board of health as aforesaid to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations as may be determined upon from time to time as essential to the proper protection of the consumer of the commodities kept and preserved in such place or places, and the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid may appoint and designate from time to time such person or persons as they deem fit for the purpose of making such inspection.

SEC. 6. All persons or corporations engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or in the business of refrigerating in the State of Delaware shall submit a quarterly report to the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid upon printed forms to be provided by said board of health, setting forth in itemized particulars the quantity of each and every foodstuff in storage or in the control of said person or persons, corporation or corporations; said quarterly report shall be filed on or before the 25th day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and reports so rendered shall show conditions existing upon the first day of the month in which said report is filed.

SEC. 7. In the event of any food or any article used for food being kept or maintained in refrigerating or cold-storage places for a longer period than six months, reports of such fact shall be filed by the person or persons, corporation or corporations, operating such cold-storage or refrigerating place with the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid upon blanks so provided by said board of health upon application, and no such food or article used for food shall, after the expiration of said period of six months, be delivered to any person or persons, corporation or corporations, without a certificate from the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid first had and obtained authorizing such delivery. Power is hereby given to said board of health, or its proper agents, to extend the time when any particular foodstuff or article used for food may be kept, maintained, or preserved in such place or places, but in no event shall permission be given to keep or maintain or preserve any foodstuff for a longer term than eight months from the date of its reception in such place or places.

SEC. 8. The transfer of any food from one cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse to another for the purpose of evading any provision of this act is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 9. Any food kept or preserved in any cold-storage warehouse or refrigerating place for a longer period than herein provided for shall be sold at public auction by the person or persons, corporation or corporations, having the custody of the same, and at the place where the same is kept or preserved, within 60 days after the time limit for the keeping or preserving thereof, unless said food has been condemned as unfit for use by the board of health having jurisdiction as aforesaid, in which case it shall be destroyed or otherwise disposed of under such conditions as the said board of health may prescribe.

SEC. 10. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, firm or agent, to dispose of poultry or game within the State of Delaware that has not been drawn before being placed in cold storage. And that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, firm or agent, to dispose of any eggs that have been kept in cold storage except from the original crate or package, said crate to be marked with the date when said eggs were placed in said cold storage or refrigerator.

SEC. 11. Any person or persons, corporation or corporations, or officer or officers thereof, violating any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not less than $100 or more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned for a term not less than 60 days or more than 1 year, or shall be sentenced with a fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 12. Nothing in this act shall be held to affect or apply to the storage or refrigerating of fruits or fish.

SEC. 13. This act shall take effect immediately upon its approval.

Approved, April 19, A. D. 1911.

CALIFORNIA.

Chapter 360.

An act relating to cold storage, the regulation of refrigerating warehouses, the disposition or sale of foods kept or preserved therein, and defining the duties of the State board of health in relation thereto.

The people of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. The term "cold storage" as used in this act shall be construed to mean a place artificially cooled to a temperature of 40° F. or below, but shall not include such a place in a private home. The term "cold stored" as used in this act shall be construed to mean the keeping of "articles of food," except eggs and butter, in "cold storage" for a period exceeding 30 days: Provided, however, That when the term "cold stored" is used in connection with eggs and butter, it shall mean the keeping of these "articles of food" in "cold storage" for any length of time whatever. The term "articles of food" as used in this act shall be construed to mean and include fresh meat and fresh-meat products (except in process of manufacture), fresh fruit and vegetables, fish, shellfish, game, poultry, eggs, butter, and cheese. The term "storer" as used in this act shall be construed to mean the person or persons who offer articles of food for cold storage.

SEC. 2. Any person, firm, or corporation desiring to operate a public cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse shall make application in writing to the State board of health for that purpose, stating the location of the plant or plants. On receipt of the application the State board of health shall cause an examination to be made into the sanitary condition of said plant or plants, and if found to be in a sanitary condition and otherwise properly equipped for the business of cold storage, the State board of health shall cause a license to be issued authorizing the applicant to operate a cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse for and during a period of one year. The license shall be issued upon payment by the applicant of a license fee of $50 to the State board of health. The secretary of the State board of health shall keep a full and correct account of all fees received under the provisions of this act, and shall, at least once each month, deposit all such fees collected with the State treasurer and make a detailed report covering same to the State comptroller, and such moneys shall be credited to the traveling and contingent fund of the State board of health to be used exclusively for the purpose of this act.

SEC. 3. In the event that any place or places, or any part thereof, covered by a license under the provisions of this act shall at any time be deemed by the State board of health to be in an insanitary condition, it shall be the duty of the State board of health to notify licensee of such condition, and upon the failure of the licensee to put said specified place or places, or the specified part thereof, in a sanitary condition within a designated time it shall be the duty of the State board of health to prohibit its use under its license (of) such specified place or places, or part thereof, as it deems in an insanitary condition until such time as it may be put in a sanitary condition.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of any person, firm, or corporation licensed to operate a cold-storage refrigeration warehouse to keep an accurate record of the receipts and the withdrawals of the articles of food, and the State board of health shall have free access to these records at any time. Every such person, firm, or corporation shall furthermore submit a quarterly report to the State board of health, setting forth in itemized particulars quantity of food products held in cold storage. Such quarterly reports shall be filed on or before the 25th day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and the reports so rendered shall show the condition existing on the first day of the month in which the report is filed. The State board of health shall have the authority to require such reports to be made at more frequent intervals than the time herein specified, if in the judgment of the State board of health more frequent reports shall be needed in the interest of a proper enforcement of this act, or for other reasons affecting the public welfare.

SEC. 5. No storer shall place in cold storage any article of food intended for human consumption if diseased, tainted, or deteriorated so as to injure its keeping qualities, or if not slaughtered, handled, and prepared for storage in accordance with the pure food and sanitary foods laws and such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the State board of health for the sanitary preparation of food products for cold storage under the authority herein conferred. Any article of food if intended for use other than human consumption before being cold stored shall be marked by the owner in accordance with forms prescribed by the State board of health, under authority hereinafter conferred, in such a way as to plainly indicate the fact that such articles are not to be sold for human food.

SEC. 6. It shall be the duty of the State board of health to inspect and supervise all cold storage or refrigerating warehouses in this State, and to make such inspection of the entry of articles of food therein as the State board of health may deem necessary to secure proper enforcement of this act. The member of the State board of health or its duly authorized agents, inspectors, or employees, shall be permitted access to such establishments and all parts thereof at all reasonable times for purposes of inspection and enforcement of the provisions of this act. The State board of health may also appoint and designate, at such salary or salaries as it may designate, such person or persons as it deems qualified to make the inspections herein required.

SEC. 7. All articles of food when deposited in cold storage shall be marked plainly on or in connection with the containers in which they are packed on the individual article with the date of receipt and when removed from cold storage shall be marked with the date of withdrawal, in accordance with such forms as may be prescribed by the State board of health, under the authority hereinafter conferred.

SEC. 8. No person, firm, or corporation as owners or having control shall keep in cold storage any article of food for a longer period than 12 calendar months, except with the consent of the State board of health, as hereinafter provided. The State board of health shall, upon application, grant permission to extend the period of storage beyond 12 months for a particular consignment of goods, if the goods in question are found upon examination to be in proper condition for further storage at the end of 12 months. The length of time for which further storage is allowed shall be specified in the order granting the permission. A report on each case in which such extension of storage may be permitted, including information relating to the reason for the action of the State board of health, the kind and amount of goods for which the storage period was extended, and the length of time for which the continuance was granted, shall be included in the annual report of the State board of health.

SEC. 9. It shall be unlawful to sell or to offer or expose for sale uncooked articles of food which have been cold stored without notifying persons purchasing or intending to purchase the same that they have been kept in cold storage, by the display in a conspicuous place and upon the articles of food of a sign marked, "These are cold-storage goods," in type at least 2 inches high; and it shall be unlawful to represent or advertise as fresh goods articles of food which have been placed in cold storage.

SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful to return to cold storage any article of food that has once been released from such storage and placed on the market for sale to consumers, but nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the transfer of goods from one cold storage or refrigerating warehouse to another: Provided, That such transfer is not made for the purpose of evading any provision of this act.

SEC. 11. The State board of health may make rules and regulations to secure a proper enforcement of the provisions of this act, including rules and regulations with respect to the sanitary preparation of articles of food for cold storage; the use of marks, tags, or labels, and the display of signs; and the violation of such rules shall be punished on conviction, as provided in section 12 of this act.

SEC. 12. Any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be punished for the first offense by a fine not exceeding $500, and for the second offense by a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 90 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 13. All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Approved June 13, 1913. In effect August 10, 1914.

INDIANA.

Chapter 71.

An act for the protection of the public health and the prevention of fraud and deception by regulating cold storage and refrigerating warehouses, and holding of food products stored therein and the sale of such products, and defining the duties of the State board of health in relation thereto. (S. 18. Approved Mar. 2, 1911.)

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That all food products which are placed or stored in any cold storage or refrigerating warehouse in this State shall be marked, stamped, or tagged, either upon the product itself or on the original package in which it is inclosed, with the date when it was placed or stored in any such cold storage or refrigerating warehouse; and all such food products when removed from any such cold storage or refrigerating warehouse shall in addition be marked, stamped, or tagged with the date when such product was removed from any such cold storage or refrigerating warehouse: Provided, however, That when such products are removed for interstate shipment such marking, stamping, or tagging shall not be required. And for the purpose of this act a cold storage or refrigerating warehouse shall be defined as one employing refrigerating machinery or ice for the purpose of refrigeration, whether for public or private use, and shall not apply to ice boxes used for temporary protection only.

SEC. 2. That all food products which shall be placed or stored in any cold storage or refrigerating warehouse after the passage of this act shall not be kept in cold storage or refrigerating warehouse for a longer period than nine months after the same has first been placed or stored therein, nor placed or stored in any other cold storage or refrigerating warehouse after nine months from the time when such food products were first placed in a cold storage or refrigerating warehouse: Provided, however, That any meat, fish, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, game, fruit, farm or garden produce, or any other perishable foodstuffs which shall have been held in cold storage or refrigerating warehouse for more than nine months shall be reported by the person, firm, or corporation operating such cold storage or refrigerating warehouse to the State board of health, and any such food product shall be inspected and if found to be unfit for human food shall be delivered forthwith to and before the nearest circuit or city judge or justice of the peace who shall order that such food product shall be drenched with kerosene oil or rendered into grease and tankage or otherwise made unfit for food as the court may direct.

SEC. 3. That all food products now in cold storage or refrigerating warehouse in this State shall be removed from cold storage and placed upon the market within nine months from the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. That no food shall be sold or offered for sale in this State which shall have been placed or stored in any cold storage or refrigerating warehouse outside of this State unless it shall have been marked, stamped, or tagged as provided for in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell or have in its possession with the intent of selling or offering or exposing for sale any package, box, bale, barrel, tub, or other receptacle in which any meats, fish, eggs, butter, cheese, poultry, game, fruits, farm or garden produce, or any other perishable foodstuffs are packed or contained and which has been taken or removed from any cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse where the stamp showing the date such articles of food were placed in any such cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse has been removed, defaced, altered, or destroyed, or is not plainly legible, nor shall such person, firm, or corporation sell, either at wholesale or retail, any storage eggs as fresh eggs, and all invoices shall plainly state whether such eggs are storage eggs or fresh, and when such eggs are sold at retail, in case eggs so sold have been in storage for 30 days, there shall be placed in or on the receptacle containing them, in full view of the public, a card not smaller than 6 inches in width by 6 inches in length, upon which shall be printed the words "cold storage" in plain gothic letters not less than 2 inches in length, and the wrapper, bag, or container in which said eggs are delivered to the purchaser by the retailer shall be plainly stamped with the words "cold storage."

SEC. 6. It shall be the duty of any person, firm, or corporation carrying on, engaged in, or conducting a business of storing perishable food or keeping or maintaining a cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse where meats, fish, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, game, fruits, farm or garden produce, or any other perishable foodstuffs are stored, to keep an accurate record of the receipts and withdrawals of all products so received or withdrawn, and the State board of health shall have free access to these records at any time.

SEC. 7. That any person, firm, or corporation desiring to carry on, engage in, or conduct a business of storing perishable food, or to keep, maintain, or operate a cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse where meats, fish, eggs, butter, cheese, poultry, game, fruits, farm or garden produce, or any other perishable foodstuffs are stored, shall make application in writing to the State board of health for that purpose, in which application shall be declared the location at which said business is proposed to be carried on. Upon receipt of the application the State board of health shall cause an examination to be made into the sanitary condition of the place of business occupied by the applicant. If upon examination said place of business is found to be in a sanitary condition, clean, and suitable for said purpose, the State board of health shall cause a license to be issued such applicant authorizing such applicant to carry on said business for and during a period of one year. The said license shall be issued upon payment by such applicant of a license fee of $10 to the treasurer of State. The license fees so paid shall be held by the treasurer of State as a fund for the enforcement of this act, and at the end of each fiscal year the unexpended balance shall revert to the general fund. All disbursements necessary for the carrying out of this act shall be paid by warrant drawn upon the treasurer of State after the filing with the auditor of State all vouchers and bills as now provided by law. In the event that said place of business shall be conducted in an unsanitary manner or in a manner contrary to the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the State board of health to revoke said license and to close the cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse until such time as it may again be in a sanitary condition, clean, and suitable for use.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the State board of health to enforce the provisions of this act, and for this purpose the State food and drug commissioner, the food inspectors of the State board of health, and the State, county, and city and town health officers shall have full power at all times to enter every building, room, basement, or cellar occupied or used or suspected of being occupied or used as a cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse, and to inspect the premises, and if upon such inspection any cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse or any employer, employee or other person is found to be violating any of the provisions of this act, or if the meats, fish, eggs, butter, cheese, poultry, game, fruit, farm or garden products, or any other perishable foodstuffs stored therein are not marked, stamped, or tagged in accordance with the provisions of this act, or are found to be unfit for food, the officer or inspector making the inspection shall furnish evidence of said violation to the prosecuting attorney of the county or circuit wherein such violations occur, who shall prosecute all person violating any of the provisions of this act. The State board of health shall adopt such rules as may be necessary to enforce this act, and violation of said rules shall be punished on conviction as set forth in section 9 of this act.

SEC. 9. That any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be punished for the first offense by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $50; for the second offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100; and for the third and subsequent offenses by a fine of $200 and imprisonment in the county jail for not less than 30 nor more than 90 days, and each day on which the cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse is found to be in violation thereof or the employer, employee, or other person is found to be violating any of the provisions of this act shall constitute a distinct and separate offense.

SEC. 10. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this statute are hereby repealed.

KANSAS.

Chapter 187.

An act to prohibit the sale of refrigerated undrawn slaughtered poultry, game, and fish, and for the protection of slaughtered fresh meats, and providing penalties for violation thereof.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas:

SECTION 1. That every person who shall offer or expose for sale at retail, for human food, at any public market, store, shop, or house, or in or about any street or other public place, any slaughtered domestic or wild fowls, rabbits, squirrels, or other small animals, wild or tame, that have been preserved by refrigeration or cold storage, unless the entrails, crops, and other offensive parts are properly drawn and removed, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be subject to a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100 for each offense.

SEC. 2. That every dealer in slaughtered fresh meats, fish, fowl, or game for human food, at wholesale or retail, at any established place, or as a peddler in the transportation of such food from place to place to customers, shall protect the same from dust, flies, and other vermin or substance which may injuriously affect it, by securely covering it while being so transported. Every violation of this provision shall be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not less than $10 or by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than 10 days.

SEC. 3. This act shall be in force and effect from and after its publication in the official State paper.

Approved, February 7, 1907.

Published in the official State paper February 9, 1907.

NEW JERSEY.

Chapter 189.

An act relating to cold storage and refrigerating warehouses and places, and the sale or disposition of the food kept or preserved herein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. The term food, as used in this act, shall include any article used for food except liquid food.

2. It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporations engaged in the business of cold-storage warehouseman, or in the business of refrigerating, or who own, operate, control, or lease any cold storage or refrigerating plant to receive, nor shall any such person, persons, or corporation place therein any article of food unless said food, or the package containing the same is branded, stamped, or marked in some conspicuous place, upon receipt thereof, with the day, month, and year when the same was received for storage or refrigerating, and it shall be unlawful for any such person, persons, or corporation to receive any article of food which has been kept in cold storage without the State, unless at the time of such receipt such article offered is branded, stamped, or marked with the day, month, and year when it was placed in the cold storage in such other State, or such person, persons, or corporation as shall have obtained the consent of the State board of health to receive such article of food.

3. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation engaged in the business of cold-storage warehouseman or in the business of refrigerating, or who own, operate, control, or lease any cold storage or refrigerating plant, to permit any article of any kind whatsoever used for food now in the possession of any person, persons, or corporation now engaged in the business of cold-storage warehouseman or refrigerating, or who own, operate, control, or lease any cold storage or refrigerating plant, to be taken from their possession without first having branded, stamped, or marked on said article of food, or the package containing the same, in a conspicuous place the day, month, and year when said article of food or package was received by any such person, persons, or corporation engaged in the business aforesaid, or by any person, persons, or corporation owning, operating, controlling, or leasing any cold-storage plant.

4. It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation engaged in the business of cold-storage warehouseman or refrigerating, or who own, operate, control, or lease any cold storage or refrigerating plant, to keep in storage for preservation or otherwise any article of food a longer period than 10 calendar months without the consent, as herein provided, of the State board of health or its duly authorized agents or officers, or except as hereinafter otherwise provided.

5. The State board of health is hereby vested with full power and authority, and it shall be the duty of said board, to inspect and supervise all places in this State now or hereafter used for cold storage or refrigerating purposes; the members of the State board of health or its duly authorized agents or employees of said board shall be permitted access to such place or places and all parts thereof at all times for the purpose of seeing that said place or places are kept and maintained in a clean and sanitary condition, and for the purpose of determining whether or not the provisions of this act or any other act relating to articles of food are being complied with. The State board of health is hereby granted power and authority to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations as may be essential to the proper protection of the consumer of the commodities kept and preserved in such place or places, and the State board of health may appoint and designate from time to time such person or persons as said board may deem fit for the purpose of making such inspection.

6. All persons or corporations engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or in the business of refrigerating, or who own, operate, control, or lease any cold storage or refrigerating plant, shall submit a quarterly report to the State board of health, upon printed forms to be provided by said State board of health, setting forth in itemized particulars the quantity of each and every article of food in storage, or in the control of said person or persons, corporation or corporations; said quarterly report shall be filed on or before the twenty-fifth day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and reports so rendered shall show conditions existing upon the first day of the month in which said report is filed.

7. In the event of any food or any article used for food being kept or maintained for a longer period in refrigerating or cold-storage places for a longer period than 10 months, report of such fact shall be filed by the person, persons, or corporation operating such cold storage or refrigerating place, or by those owning, operating, controlling, or leasing any cold storage or refrigerating plant with the State board of health upon blanks to be provided by said State board of health upon application, and no such food or article used for food shall, after the expiration of said period of 10 months be delivered to any person, persons, or corporation without a certificate from the State board of health first had and obtained authorizing such delivery. Power is hereby given to said State board of health, or its proper agents, to extend the time when any particular foodstuff or article used for food may be kept, maintained, or preserved in such place or places.

8. The transfer of any food from one cold storage or refrigerating warehouse to another for the purpose of evading any provisions of this act is hereby prohibited.

9. When food which has been in cold storage is released therefrom for the purpose of placing on the market for sale, it shall be a violation of the provisions of this act to knowingly again place such food in cold storage.

10. Any article of food kept or preserved in any cold-storage warehouse or refrigerating place for a longer period than herein provided, after at least 20 days' notice to the owner or consignor of such article of food to remove the same, shall be sold at public auction by the person, persons, or corporation having the custody of the same, and at the place where the same is kept or preserved; such sale shall be within 30 days after the time limit for the keeping or preserving thereof, and the proceeds of such sale shall be paid to the owner or consignor thereof after deducting storage or other charges thereon, unless said food has been condemned as unfit for use by the State board of health, in which case it shall be destroyed or otherwise disposed of under such conditions as the State board of health may prescribe.

11. Any person or persons, corporation or corporations, or officer or officers thereof violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be subject to a penalty of not exceeding $500 for the first offense. Any such person or persons, corporation or corporations, or officer or officers thereof having once been convicted of violating any provision of this act shall, upon a second offense, be held guilty of a misdemeanor. The conviction of any corporation shall not operate to relieve any officer or officers, agents, or employees of such corporation from prosecution under the provisions of this act.

12. If any paragraph or provision of this act shall be questioned in any court and held to be invalid, the remainder of this act shall not be invalidated thereby, but shall remain in full force and effect.

13. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

14. This act shall take effect immediately.

Approved, April 21, 1911.

MASSACHUSETTS.

An act to regulate the cold storage of certain food products.

Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

SECTION 1. The term "cold storage," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean the storage of articles of food at or below a temperature of 40° F. in cold-storage or refrigerating warehouses.

The term "cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean an establishment employing refrigerating machinery or ice for the purpose of refrigeration, or a place otherwise artificially cooled, in which articles of food are stored for 30 days or more at a temperature of 40° F. or below.

The term "article of food," as used in this act, shall be interpreted to include fresh meat, fresh meat products, except in process of manufacture, fresh food, fish, poultry, eggs, and butter.

SEC. 2. No person, firm, or corporation shall operate a cold storage or refrigerating warehouse without a license issued by the State board of health. Any person, firm, or corporation desiring such a license may make written application to the board, stating the location of its plant or plants. On receipt of the application the board shall cause an examination to be made of the sanitary condition of any such plant, and if it is found to be in a sanitary condition and otherwise properly equipped for the business of cold storage the board shall cause a license to be issued authorizing the applicant to operate a cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse for a period of one year. The license shall be issued upon payment by the applicant of a license fee of $10 to the treasurer of the Commonwealth. In case any warehouse licensed under the provisions of this section or any part thereof shall be deemed by the State board of health to be conducted in an insanitary manner it shall be the duty of the board to close such warehouse, or part thereof, until it shall be put in sanitary condition, and the board shall have power also to suspend the license in case the required changes are not made within a reasonable time. Every such licensee shall furthermore submit a quarterly report to the State board of health on a printed form to be provided by the board. The report shall be filed on or before the 25th day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and it shall state the quantities of articles of food placed in cold storage during the three months preceding the first day of the said months, respectively, and also the quantities of butter and eggs held on the first day of the month in which the report is filed.

SEC. 3. No article of food intended for human consumption shall be placed in cold storage if deemed by the State board of health to be diseased, tained, or otherwise unwholesome.

It shall be the duty of the State board of health to inspect and supervise all cold-storage or refrigerating warehouses in this Commonwealth, and to make such inspection of the entry of articles of food therein as the board may deem necessary to secure proper enforcement of this act. The members of the board or its duly authorized agents, inspectors, or employees shall be permitted access to such establishments, and all parts thereof, at all reasonable times, for purposes of inspection and enforcement of the provisions of this act or of any other provision of law relating to food products. The board may also appoint and designate such person or persons as it deems qualified to make the inspections herein required.

SEC. 4. All articles of food when deposited in cold storage shall be marked plainly with the date of receipt on the containers in which they are packed, or, if not packed, in containers, on or in connection with the articles, except fish.

SEC. 5. No article of food shall be held in cold storage within this Commonwealth for a longer period than 12 calendar months, except with the consent of the State board of health, as hereinafter provided. The State board of health may, upon application, grant permission to extend the period of storage beyond 12 months for a particular consignment of goods if the goods in question are found, upon examination, to be in proper condition for further storage at the end of 12 months. The length of time for which further storage is allowed shall be specified in the order granting the permission. A report on each case in which such extension of storage may be permitted, including information relating to the reason for the action of the board, the kind and amount of goods for which the storage period was extended, and the length of time for which the continuance was granted, shall be included in the annual report of the board.

SEC. 6. It shall be unlawful to sell, or to offer or expose for sale, articles of food which have been held in cold storage without notifying persons purchasing or intending to purchase the same that they have been kept so by the display of a sign marked, "Cold-storage goods sold here," and it shall be unlawful to represent or advertise as fresh goods articles of food which have been held in cold storage.

SEC. 7. It shall be unlawful to return to cold storage any article of food that has once been released from such storage for the purpose of placing it on the market for sale to consumers, but nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the transfer of goods from one cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse to another, provided that such transfer is not made for the purpose of evading any provision of this act.

SEC. 8. Broken eggs packed in cans, if not intended for use as food, when deposited in cold storage shall be marked by the owner in accordance with forms prescribed by the State board of health, under the authority herein conferred, in such a way as plainly to indicate the fact that they are not to be sold for food.

SEC. 9. The State board of health may make rules and regulations to secure a proper enforcement of the provisions of this act, including rules and regulations with the respect to the use of marks, tags, or labels, and the display of signs, and may fix penalties for the breach thereof.

SEC. 10. Any person, firm, or corporation violating any provision of this act shall upon conviction be punished for the first offense by a fine not exceeding $100, and for the second offense by a fine not exceeding $500, or, if the offense is committed by a person acting either in his individual capacity or in behalf of the firm or corporation, by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or by both fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 11. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 12. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of September, 1912.

Approved, May 27, 1912.

An act relating to the sale of eggs taken from cold storage.

Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

SECTION 1. Whenever eggs that have been in cold storage are sold at retail, or offered or exposed for sale, the basket, box, or other container in which the eggs are placed shall be marked plainly and conspicuously with the words "Cold-storage eggs," or there shall be attached to such container a placard or sign having on it the said words. If eggs that have been held in cold storage are sold at retail or offered or exposed for sale without a container, or placed upon a counter or elsewhere, a sign or placard having the words "Cold-storage eggs" plainly and conspicuously marked upon it, shall be displayed in, upon, or immediately above the said eggs; the intent of this act being that cold-storage eggs sold at retail or offered or exposed for sale shall be designated in such a manner that the purchaser will know that they are cold-storage eggs. The display of the words "cold-storage eggs," as required by this act, shall be done in such a manner as is approved by the State board of health.

SEC. 2. Violation of any provision of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $500 for each offense.

Approved April 25, 1913.

NEW YORK.

Chapter 335.

An act to amend the public health law, relating to cold-storage and refrigerating warehouses and places, and the sale or disposition of the food kept or preserved therein.

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Chapter 49 of the laws of 1909, entitled, "An act in relation to the public health, constituting chapter 45 of the consolidated laws," is hereby amended by adding after article 16 thereof a new article to be article 16–a, to read as follows:

ARTICLE 16–A.—Cold storage.

335. Definitions: The term food as used in this article shall include any article, except nuts, fruits, cheese, and vegetables, used for food by man or animal and every ingredient of such article.

336. Cold-storage food to be marked: It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen, or in the business of refrigerating, to receive any kind of food unless the said food is in an apparently pure and wholesome condition and the food or package containing the same is branded, stamped, or marked, in some conspicuous place, with the day, month, and year when the same is received in storage or refrigeration.

It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or in the business of refrigerating to permit any article of any kind whatsoever used for food in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or refrigerating to be taken from their possession without having first branded, stamped, or marked on said foodstuffs, or the package containing same, in a conspicuous place the day, month, and year when said foodstuffs or packages were removed from cold storage or refrigeration.

337. Time that cold-storage foods may be kept: It shall hereafter be unlawful for any person, corporation, or corporations engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen or refrigerating to keep in storage for preservation or otherwise any kind of food or any article used for food a longer period than 10 calendar months, excepting butter products, which may be kept in said cold storage or refrigeration 12 calendar months.

338. Powers of State commissioner of health: The State commissioner of health is hereby vested with full power and authority to inspect and supervise all places in this State now used or hereafter to be used for cold-storage or refrigerating purposes. The State commissioner of health or his duly authorized agents or employees shall be permitted access to such place or places and all parts thereof at all times for the purpose of seeing that said place or places are kept and maintained in a clean and sanitary manner and for the purpose of determining whether or not the provisions of this article or any other act relating to foodstuffs are being complied with. The power of supervision hereby granted shall extend to enable the State commissioner of health to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations as may be determined upon from time to time as essential to the proper protection of the consumer of the commodities kept and preserved in such place or places, and the State commissioner of health may appoint and designate from time to time such person or persons as he deems fit for the purpose of making such inspections.

339. Reports of warehousemen: All persons or corporations engaged in the business of cold-storage warehousemen, or in the business of refrigerating, shall submit reports to the State department of health, upon printed forms to be provided by said State department of health, setting forth in itemized particulars the quantity of each and every foodstuff in storage or in the control of said person or persons, corporation or corporations. Said reports shall be filed on or before the 25th day of January, May, and September of each year, and reports so rendered shall show conditions existing upon the first day of the month in which said report is filed.

339–a. Transfers from one warehouse to another: The transfer of any food from one cold-storage or refrigerating warehouse to another for the purpose of evading any provision of this article is hereby prohibited.

339–b. Prohibits return of food to cold storage when once released for purpose of placing same on market for sale: When food has been in cold storage or refrigeration and is released therefrom for the purpose of placing the same on the market for sale it shall be a violation of the provisions of this article to again place such food in cold storage or refrigeration.

339–c. Prohibits sale of food kept in cold storage without representing said fact: It shall be a violation of the provisions of this article to sell any article or articles of food that have been kept in cold storage or refrigeration without representing the same to have been so kept.

339–d. Penalties: Any person or persons, corporation or corporations, or officer or officers thereof, violating any of the provisions of this article shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The conviction of any corporation shall not operate to relieve any officer or officers, agents, or employees of such corporation from prosecution under the provisions of this article.

2. This act shall take effect immediately.

Became a law June 15, 1911, with the approval of the governor. Passed, three-fifths being present.

PENNSYLVANIA.

An act for the protection of the public health and the prevention of fraud and deception, by regulating the storage and sale of cold-storage foods, fixing penalties for the violation of the provisions thereof, and providing for the enforcement thereof.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known, and may be cited, as the "Cold-storage act of 1913."

SEC. 2. The term "cold storage," as used in this act, shall mean the storage of food, at or below a temperature of 40° F., in a cold-storage warehouse.

SEC. 3. The term "cold-storage warehouse," as used in this act, shall mean an establishment employing refrigerating machinery or ice for the purpose of refrigeration, or a place otherwise artificially cooled, in which articles of food are stored for 30 days or more at a temperature of 40° F. or under.

SEC. 4. The term "food," as used in this act, shall mean the fresh flesh of animals and fresh products therefrom, the fresh flesh of fowls, fresh food fish, eggs, and butter which have been stored in a cold-storage warehouse.

SEC. 5. The word "container," as used in this act, shall be taken to mean any bag, band, barrel, basket, bottle, box, caddy, can, canister, carton, crate, firkin, hogshead, jar, jug, keg, stopper, vessel, wrapper, frozen bulk, or any similar or analogous utensil, receptacle, band, or wrapper in which food may be kept, stored, sold, or offered for sale.

SEC. 6. The word "marked," as used in this act, shall be taken to mean written, printed, stamped, or painted, or any other means whereby words or figures may be indicated in or on a container, or on any cover attached thereto.

SEC. 7. The term "wholesome," as used in this act, shall mean fit for human food.

SEC. 8. No person, firm, or corporation shall operate a cold-storage warehouse without a license issued by the department of agriculture, through its agent, the dairy and food commissioner. Such license shall be issued only on written application, stating the location of such warehouse. Upon receipt of the application, said dairy and food commissioner shall cause an examination to be made into the sanitary conditions of such warehouse. If it be found to be in a sanitary condition and properly equipped for the purpose of cold storage, the dairy and food commissioner shall cause a license to be issued, authorizing the applicant to operate a cold-storage warehouse during the period of one year from the date of such license. No license shall be issued until the applicant therefor shall have paid to the dairy and food commissioner the sum of $50. A license shall be required for each separate warehouse building.

SEC. 9. Whenever any warehouse licensed under the provisions of this act, or any portion of such warehouse, shall be deemed by the dairy and food commissioner to be in an insanitary condition, it shall be the duty of the dairy and food commissioner to cause such warehouse, or portion thereof, to be closed until it shall be put in a sanitary condition. If such changes be not made within a reasonable time, the dairy and food commissioner may suspend or revoke the license granted for the operation of such warehouse. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to operate any such warehouse, or portion thereof, when the same shall be closed by order of the dairy and food commissioner.

SEC. 10. It shall be the duty of every person, firm, or corporation that shall be licensed to operate a cold-storage warehouse to keep an accurate record of the receipts and withdrawals of food therefrom. The agents of the dairy and food commissioner shall have free access to such records at all times. It shall be the duty of each person, firm, or corporation, licensed to operate a cold-storage warehouse, to file in the office of the dairy and food commissioner, on or before the 6th day of January, April, July, and October of each year, a report setting forth in itemized particulars the kind and quantities of food products held in cold storage in such warehouse. The report shall be made on printed forms prepared and supplied by the dairy and food commissioner. If, in the judgment of the dairy and food commissioner, it shall be deemed better in enforcing this act to cause reports to be made at more frequent intervals than herein required, said dairy and food commissioner may cause such reports to be filed in accordance herewith.

SEC. 11. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to place in any cold-storage warehouse, to keep therein, or to sell, offer, or expose for sale, any diseased, tainted, or otherwise unwholesome food.

SEC. 12. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to place in any cold-storage warehouse any slaughtered animals, or parts thereof, unless the entrails and other offensive parts have been first properly removed.

SEC. 13. It shall be the duty of the dairy and food commissioner to cause to be made a careful inspection of all cold-storage foods, with a view to determining whether the same are wholesome. Such inspection shall be made where such food is stored; and each package of such food so inspected shall bear the marks, stamps, or other device for identification provided for in this section. It shall be the duty of the dairy and food commissioner to make such rules and regulations as he may deem proper, relating to such inspection and supervision and to the cold storage of food, and otherwise to secure the proper enforcement of this act. Duly authorized agents of the dairy and food commissioner may, at any reasonable time, enter such warehouse and inspect the same.

SEC. 14. All food when deposited in cold-storage warehouses shall have plainly marked upon the container the date that such food shall be placed in such warehouses. If such food be not in a container, such marking shall be on such food, or on a tag or label securely and permanently attached thereto. Such food, or the container thereof, shall have marked plainly thereon the date of withdrawal of such food from such warehouses. The marking of food, in accordance with the terms of this section, shall be under such regulations as may be prescribed by the dairy and food commissioner.

SEC. 15. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, or any agent thereof, to sell, or offer or expose for sale, or have in possession with intent to sell, at wholesale, any food which is not marked and distinguished, on the outside of each container, in a conspicuous place, by a placard with the words "Wholesome cold-storage food" printed thereon; such placard to be placed in a conspicuous position, in full view of the purchaser; and the said words "Wholesome cold-storage food," on such placard, shall be printed in plain, uncondensed gothic letters, not less than one-half inch in length; and, in addition, all such food shall be marked with the date when it is placed in any such cold-storage warehouse, and with the date when it is withdrawn from such cold-storage warehouse.

There shall also be displayed upon every open container containing such food, in the same manner, in a conspicuous position, a placard with the words "Wholesome cold-storage food" printed thereon, in the same form as above described in this section; and when such food is sold from such container, or otherwise, at retail, before being delivered to the purchaser it shall be wrapped in wrappers plainly stamped on the outside thereof with the words "Wholesome cold-storage food" printed or stamped thereon in letters one-fourth inch square, and such wrapper shall also contain the date of first placing such food in cold storage; and the said words "Wholesome cold-storage food" and the date of first placing such food in cold storage so stamped or printed on said wrapper shall not be in any manner concealed, but shall be in plain view of the purchaser at the time of the purchase.

SEC. 16. No person, firm, or corporation shall sell, offer, or expose for sale any of the herein-named foods which shall have been held for a longer period of time than herein specified in a cold-storage warehouse or warehouses, to wit: Whole carcasses of beef, or any parts thereof, 4 months; whole carcasses of pork, or any parts thereof, 6 months; whole carcasses of sheep, or any parts thereof, 6 months; whole carcasses of lamb, or any parts thereof, 6 months; whole carcasses of veal, or any parts thereof, 3 months; dressed fowl, drawn, 5 months; dressed fowl, undrawn, 10 months; eggs, 8 months; butter, 9 months; and fish, 9 months.

SEC. 17. After food has been withdrawn from a cold-storage warehouse, for the purpose of placing it on the market for sale, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to return such food, or any portion thereof, to such warehouse or any other similar warehouse. Subject to such regulations as shall be prescribed to the dairy and food commissioner, food may be transferred from one cold-storage warehouse to another: Provided, That the total length of time such food shall remain in cold storage, for the purpose of sale, shall not exceed the time specified in section 16 of this act.

SEC. 18. No food shall be sold, or offered or exposed for sale, in this State which shall have been placed or stored in any cold-storage warehouse outside of this State unless it first shall have been marked as provided for in section 15 of this act: Provided, however, That no such food shall be sold or offered or exposed for sale in this State if the total length of time that such food has remained in cold storage shall exceed that specified in section 16 of this act.

SEC. 19. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to mark, or cause to be marked, any container of food with a mark or marks other than those required by this act to be marked on such food or container. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to change, or cause to be changed, any mark or marks on any food or container after such mark or marks have been placed thereon: Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to the marking of such container with the name and address of the owner thereof.

SEC. 20. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the shipping, consigning, or transporting of fresh food in properly refrigerated cars within this State to points of destination; nor, when received, to prohibit the same being held in a cooling room for a period of 48 hours: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the keeping of fresh food in ice boxes or refrigerators in retail stores while the same is offered or exposed for sale.

SEC. 21. It shall be the duty of the department of agriculture, through its dairy and food commissioner, to enforce all of the provisions of this act, and to make all rules and regulations, not otherwise herein provided, necessary for the enforcement of the same.

SEC. 22. That all license fees and fines and penalties imposed and recovered for the violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be paid to the dairy and food commissioner or his agent, and when so collected and paid, shall thereafter be by the dairy and food commissioner paid into the State treasury for the use of the Commonwealth in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 23. Any person, firm, or corporation that shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced for the first offense to pay a fine not exceeding $500; and for the second and each subsequent offense such person, firm, or corporation shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not more than $1,000, and, in addition thereto, such person or the members of such firm, or the officers of such corporation, as the case may be, with guilty knowledge of the fact, may be sentenced to undergo imprisonment in the jail of the proper county for a period of not less than 30 nor more than 90 days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 24. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are repealed.

SEC. 25. This law shall take effect 90 days after its final passage.

Approved the 16th day of May, A. D. 1913.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, August 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 13, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

As the heavens declare Thy glory, O God our Heavenly Father, and all things obey Thy will, help us as intellectual, moral, and spiritual beings to obey the laws Thou hast written in our hearts.

Thus, by the rectitude of our behavior, reflect Thy glory. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. To resume consideration of the resolution which was under consideration when the House adjourned yesterday.

The SPEAKER. This being Calendar Wednesday, that matter can not come up until to-morrow. Such business is not in order on Calendar Wednesday. To-day is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before taking up the calendar I think we should have a quorum present, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. On Calendar Wednesday the Chair thinks that is not permissible. The gentleman can undoubtedly get time on the bill which will come up, on which there will be general debate.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is in order on Calendar Wednesday. After the calendar is disposed of the gentleman can do that. The Clerk will call the committees.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTING.

The Clerk called the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration H. R. 8362, to amend and revise the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up for consideration a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of H. R. 8362.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the proposition as to debate on the bill?

Mr. KIESS. That we will use the two hours.

Mr. MANN. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House I will say that there has been no general revision or codification of the printing laws since 1895. Substantially all the provisions of this bill, however, have been under consideration by Congress since 1911, when a bill proposing a complete revision of the printing laws was introduced by Senator SMOOT as chairman of the Printing Investigation Commission. That commission had spent seven years investigating the public printing and binding, and concluded its work by proposing a bill to effect many reforms and economies in Government printing. The general printing bill was favorably reported from the Printing Committees of both Houses in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses. It passed the Senate without opposition in the Sixty-second Congress and the House in the Sixty-third Congress. An abridged printing bill along the lines of the one now reported also passed the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress. However, owing to the crowded calendar of the other House when the bill reached it and the short time of the Congress remaining for its consideration, neither bill as passed by one House was acted upon by the other House in the same Congress and thus failed to become a law.

The committee is of the opinion that the size and scope of the former printing bills also prevented their prompt consideration and enactment by Congress. The general printing bill as submitted to the Sixty-fourth Congress consisted of 132 pages and proposed a complete revision of all laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications. The bill now reported for the consideration of the House is about one-third the size of the former bills and its subject matter is confined almost entirely to printing and binding for Congress. In fact, the bill proposes that it shall be designated as "The congressional printing act." The former bills included also revisions of the laws relating to the Government Printing Office and printing and binding for the various departments and other establishments of the Government. The committee decided to reserve these subjects for future consideration and to report only the congressional section of the general bill at this time, in the hope that at least so much of the proposed economies will be made effective without further delay.

The following is a brief legislative history of the various printing bills:

In the Sixty-first Congress a general printing bill submitted by the Printing Investigation Commission was favorably reported to the Senate from its Committee on Printing. This bill was not acted upon by the Senate.

In the Sixty-second Congress a general printing bill was passed by the Senate without opposition and favorably reported to the House by the House Committee on Printing, of which Hon. David E. Finley, of South Carolina, was chairman. This bill, although favorably reported to the House, failed of further consideration, owing to the crowded calendar of the House at that time.

In the Sixty-third Congress another general printing bill, introduced by Hon. Henry A. Barnhart, of Indiana, chairman of the committee, passed the House and was favorably reported to the Senate, but failed of passage there owing to the crowded calendar and the short session.

In the Sixty-fourth Congress a general printing bill was favorably reported to both the House and the Senate. This bill was considered by the House on two Calendar Wednesdays, but no further action was taken in regard thereto. Near the close of the Congress the Senate passed an abridgement of the printing bill relating to Congress. A similar bill was introduced in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, but there was no opportunity for consideration of it. An important provision of the bill relating to the organization and duties of the Joint Committee on Printing was taken from the bill and enacted into law by this Congress as section 6 of Public Act No. 381.

In the Sixty-fifth Congress, owing to war conditions, a general printing bill was not introduced, but the congressional printing bill, similar to that passed by the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress, was introduced in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. An important provision of the bill relating to the powers of the Joint Committee on Printing and requiring substantially all printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office was taken from the general printing bill and enacted into law by this Congress as section 11 of Public Act No. 314.

I was a member of the Committee on Printing during the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses, and became chairman of that committee in the present Congress. The bill now being considered by the House proposes an estimated annual economy in printing and binding as charged to Congress of $507,581.80.

This represents a reduction in the charge for printing and binding for Congress of almost a third, since the total cost of printing for Congress for the fiscal year 1918 was $1,566,097.74. The cost of paper used in all printing for Congress amounts to about one-sixth of the total charge. On this basis the saving to the Government in paper alone in the economies proposed by the bill will be approximately $85,000 a year.

That the present method of printing and distributing Government publications has become an almost utter failure is clearly evident from the enormous accumulation of obsolete and useless documents in the Government warehouses year after year. In seven years these accumulations reached a total of almost 7,000,000 publications, the great bulk of which had to be disposed of as waste paper without ever having been unwrapped by anyone.

The accumulation in 1909 of 1,435,272 publications in the office of the superintendent of documents resulted from documents returned by the departments and libraries that had no further use for such publications. The books had become so obsolete and shelf worn as to be unfit for further distribution, and the entire accumulation of 1,435,272 publications was sold by the Public Printer as waste paper at eight-tenths of a cent a pound. The accumulation weighed approximately 950 tons, and the amount received therefor was $14,049.02. The Public Printer had, however, expended $2,825 in handling this accumulation, which made the net receipts $11,224.02. These publications undoubtedly cost the Government fully $700,000, thousands of them having been bound in the best grades of cloth and leather, thus indicating a net loss of $683,125.98 on this one accumulation.

When the accumulation of 1910 was reported to the Printing Commission, it submitted a complete inventory of the books listed for condemnation to every department and establishment of the Government to ascertain whether any further use could be made of the publications. Without exception, all the departments reported that they had on hand a sufficient number of each publication. Accordingly the Public Printer was authorized to sell the same as waste paper. The 959,698 publications weighed approximately 700 tons, and brought about eight-tenths of a cent a pound as waste paper, though the blank white paper on which the books were printed had cost the Government from 3½ to 7 cents a pound, without regard to the cost of printing, binding, and handling the same.

In 1911, when the Public Printer requested authority to dispose of an accumulation of 473,457 useless publications returned to the office of the superintendent of documents, the Printing Commission undertook to ascertain whether any of these publications were of use to Members of Congress. Printed inventories of the accumulation were sent to every Member of Congress with letters stating that they could have such of the publications as they desired to file upon. In response to this letter the commission received requests for these documents from only 160 out of 485 Members of the House and Senate. These 160 Members took a total of only 180,714 documents out of the accumulation of approximately half a million placed at their disposal. The balance of this accumulation of documents had to be sold as waste paper. Thousands of the documents selected by Members from the accumulation were afterwards thrown aside or returned to the superintendent of documents, having been found to be utterly worthless.

Printed inventories of the accumulations of 1912, 1913, and 1915 were also submitted to every Senator and Member of Congress, but, out of the entire membership of 536, less than 150 Members responded in 1912 with requests for documents from the accumulation. In 1913, 128 requests were received from Members of Congress, who selected only 79,289 of the 544,711 publications listed, and subsequently many of these were returned to the superintendent of documents as worthless. In 1915 only 161 Members filed requests for documents listed in the accumulation of that year, and they did not find use for more than 10 per cent of the million and a half publications submitted for their consideration before being disposed of as waste paper. Consequently, the Public Printer had to sell practically all the excess documents of 1912, 1913, and 1915 as waste paper.

The committee that investigated the useless documents in the House folding room in 1910 reported there was practically no demand for the million old pamphlets and publications that had accumulated therein and had become "wholly useless." The committee said in its report recommending the sale of these worthless publications:

There are in the vaults of the Capitol perhaps a thousand tons of worthless printed paper which cumbers the earth and is of no value to anyone.

The House permitted its Members to draw out such of these documents as they desired, but the great bulk had to be subsequently sold as waste paper.

The Senate in 1914 disposed of its folding-room accumulation of 815,366 old documents. Printed inventories of this accumulation were submitted twice to each Senator, and additional lists were sent to every department and establishment of the Government for their selection, but nearly 150 tons had to be sold as waste paper at 71 cents per hundred pounds.

The record of the seven years thus shows that almost 1,000,000 Government publications find their way into Uncle Sam's junk pile each year. These publications undoubtedly cost the Government at least 50 cents a copy on an average for their printing, binding, wrapping, handling, and storage. Upon thousands of these worthless documents there was also additional expense for transportation in the mails from Washington to various parts of the country, and then for return to Washington.

On a basis of 50 cents per copy, the accumulation of 1,000,000 documents per year indicates an annual loss of $500,000, due to the system of printing and distribution now required by the present law. Undoubtedly double the number of worthless documents accumulated by the Government itself more nearly represents the actual waste of such publications, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the great bulk of the documents allotted to and distributed by Members of Congress finds its way into the wastebaskets of their constituents, who have little or no interest in the general class of publications that Senators and Members now have allotted to them for public distribution. It would be more accurate to estimate the waste in Government publications to be nearly $1,000,000 a year.

There is also a great waste in many publications printed for the document rooms of the Senate and the House. Tons of useless publications are carted away from the document rooms annually and sold as waste paper. Scores of tons of expensive publications have rotted away in the vaults under the terraces of the Capitol, the document room to which they were allotted not having been able to find Members willing to distribute such useless publications.

To prevent a continuance of this enormous loss, and at the same time establish an economical and efficient method of printing and distributing the publications of the Government, the pending bill has been proposed. Particular attention is invited to the valuation plan for the distribution of publications by Members of Congress as proposed in section 20 of the bill. The plan for distribution of Government publications to depository libraries is proposed in section 28. The restriction of printing for the document rooms of Congress to those publications that are of real use for legislative purposes is proposed in section 3. It is believed that the adoption of these provisions will end the shameful waste in Government documents and at the same time more generally supply the public with such useful publications as it desires.

The report accompanying this bill gives a very complete analysis of the proposed changes from existing law, and during the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule, when we take it up section by section for amendment, I will be glad to answer any questions and to give any information that I can.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Certainly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have not had an opportunity to read this bill. Does it make any changes in any publications that may be allotted to the Members of Congress in the Agricultural Department in the way of farmers' bulletins and things of that kind?

Mr. KIESS. No; it does not deal with that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC], a member of the committee, will be recognized to control the time on that side.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Printing has devoted a great deal of time to the consideration of this legislation, and we believe that its enactment into law will correct a great many of the evils of the present system of printing and the distribution of public documents.

The Public Printer has made the statement that if this bill is enacted into law approximately $500,000 can be saved on paper alone in each year. He has also made the statement that there are approximately 500,000 useless documents being printed each year, and that if this bill is enacted into law sufficient provision will be made so that this expense can be greatly reduced.

Probably the most important item in this bill is what is known as the exchange provision, which will allow each Member of Congress to exchange the publications that he does not desire for a class of publications that will be of benefit to him in his district.

According to the statement made by the Public Printer, each Member of the House is entitled to some $1,800 worth of public documents. If he does not desire to use certain documents he can notify the Public Printer in writing and he can exchange those documents that he does not desire for those that will be of service to him. We are hoping that this legislation can be enacted into law so it can bring about more efficiency, and so we can bring about a great saving in the expenditure of public money. I am sure that all of those who will give heed to the remarks on this legislation or read the bill will agree with those who have made a careful study of this subject. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] as he may desire to address the House.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY IN THE SOUTH—THEIR RELATION TO LAND SETTLEMENT BY SOLDIERS.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, to Col. Henry S. Graves, Chief of the Forest Service, and to Hon. Henry E. Hardtner, of Urania, La., I am deeply indebted for valuable and accurate data presented in this discussion.

My purpose is to offer some contribution to the solution of the serious problem of the proper economic future use and development of our cut-over lands.

Secretary Lane's plan for establishing returned soldiers in agricultural communities, resulting in House resolution 487, has brought to public attention the vast area of cut-over lands in the Southern States. These lands include perhaps our largest remaining undeveloped area of potential agricultural value. Their eventual disposition and use is of the most vital importance, not only to the communities and States directly concerned, but also to the whole Nation.

On them grew the immense stands of pines and of valuable hardwoods which for many years have been the foundation of a very large part of the lumber industry of the United States. During the year 1917 the forests of the States from Virginia to Texas produced more than 17,000,000,000 board feet of lumber, or just about one-half of all the lumber produced in the United States, besides vast quantities of staves, railroad ties, poles, posts, pulpwood, and other products. The lumber industry in these States represented in 1914 an investment in excess of $400,000,000 and employed 250,000 wage earners. More than $100,000,000 was invested in manufacturing industries making products wholly or chiefly from wood, and these industries employed upward of 50,000 wage earners. The naval-stores industry, in which the United States leads the world, is confined to the long-leaf and slash-pine belt from North Carolina to Texas. This industry, which has already passed its zenith, still produces annually a product worth more than $20,000,000, gives employment to nearly 35,000 wage earners, and represents an investment of more than $20,000,000.

The Southern States have a total forest area of a little less than 200,000,000 acres, but it is estimated that less than one-third of this area bears mature timber, and the area of merchantable timber is being reduced at the rate of at least 2,000,000 acres each year. Of the approximately 130,000,000 acres of pine lands only 35,000,000 acres are covered with mature timber. With almost 40 per cent of the forest area of the United States, this region has now only about 20 per cent of the standing timber. Recently representative southern lumbermen have stated that the virgin southern pine timber will be practically exhausted within 10 or 15 years, except for the holdings of a very few large mills. The hardwoods will last somewhat longer, but under present methods will not form the basis of a permanent industry, nor one of the magnitude of the present pine industry.

If all of the forest lands of the South were suitable for growing agricultural crops, so that the passing of the lumber industry would result in a higher use of the land, there could be little legitimate objection to its passing. Such, however, is not the case. It is well understood in every region where forests abound that there are still large areas of soils which are not adapted for farm-crop production, but which still produce forest crops. This is no less true in the South, even though the proportion of good agricultural soil is higher there than in any other well-forested region of the country. It is not enough that the agricultural soils be put in a productive condition, the forest soils must also be kept productive. Not only is there no valid reason why agriculture and forestry can not go on side by side, but it is of the greatest advantage to each that they should do so.

Settlers in a newly developing region especially require large quantities of lumber at low prices for the construction of buildings and fences, and for other purposes. They need a continued supply of such material for the improvement and upkeep of their farms. When their lumber has to be brought from great distances, as is the case now in certain sections of the Lake States, which although once heavily timbered are now bringing lumber from Oregon and Washington, the carrying charges make the cost so high as to be almost prohibitive.

Settlers in any region, and those even on the best grades of cut-over lands, where the costs of clearing the land are high, need the opportunity to work for wages part of the time in order to make a living until their farms are in condition to support them. Even afterwards the possibility of earning something during the slack season to supplement the income from their farms is a great help, and makes possible the successful cultivation of soils which are not of the highest agricultural value. Likewise the forest industries will afford to the settlers a source of emergency farm labor, which they need but could not have if these industries were absent.

The presence of an important industry like the lumber industry insures the settlers a near-by market for a considerable part of their produce. This is of considerable advantage, at least in the early stages of settlement, when transportation facilities are less fully developed and before outside market connections have been established. Moreover, the presence of such an industry, furnishing a large amount of tonnage, is bound to result in better transportation facilities, particularly railroads, than if the traffic depended on the products of the farms alone.

The burden of taxation on the settlers, for the purposes of constructing local improvements such as roads, bridges, and schools, will be much lighter if all of the land is in a productive state than if the improved agricultural land alone has to carry it.

The maintenance in a productive condition of all of the cut-over nonagricultural lands of a region will involve, in the first place, a well-organized system of protection against fires. That such protection is of extreme importance to settlers in cut-over regions has been shown many times where it was lacking, most recently in northern Minnesota, where thousands of farmers last fall lost everything they owned except the land and where nearly 400 people lost their lives.

It is also self-evident that the presence of permanent forest communities, such as sawmill towns or centers of wood-manufacturing industries, contributes toward healthier rural social conditions, with the opportunities for better schools, libraries, churches, stores, banks, theaters, and other forms of recreation, and with more diverse interests and points of view than would be possible with a scattered purely agricultural population.

But not all of the advantages in such a combination of industries will be on the side of the farmers. There are several very distinct advantages for the forest industries themselves. It is pretty generally recognized now that in order to be most efficient laborers in forest industries must be fairly well settled in places which they can call home. Many lumber companies are encouraging their employees to settle down and even to cultivate small farms. In some of the older forest regions, such as the white-pine region of New England, most of the logging is done in winter by farmers who operate their farms in the summer. The agricultural settlement of suitable land in forest regions will insure a supply of settled, contented laborers, who will be vitally interested in the continued existence and prosperity of the forest industry.

It will also afford a market for part of the products of that industry—more particularly for the lower grade products, which can not stand heavy transportation charges, and hence must, under present conditions, usually be left in the woods or marketed at a loss. Such are the lower grades of lumber, suitable in many cases for rough or temporary farm construction or for box or crate material for shipping farm products, and posts, firewood, and similar material. Even the ashes from the refuse burners have considerable value for fertilizer, if they can be sold to near-by farmers.

Moreover, the segregation of forest lands and their management on a continuous-yield basis for the production of timber and allied products will increase the desirability and hence the sale value of the agricultural soils. Settlers will be much more eager to locate where they are assured of a lasting supply of timber at reasonable prices, of opportunity for work when they need it, of the cooperation of permanent forest industries in meeting the burdens of taxation and fire protection, of markets for their products, of good railroad and civic facilities, than in places where all of these advantages are, or in a few years will be, lacking. The increased values of their agricultural lands may in many cases much more than offset the cost to the forest owners and industries of initiating forestry measures, while the advantages gained by the presence of permanent agricultural settlements, including a settled labor supply and the possibility of disposing of their lower-grade products will more than counterbalance any extra costs incurred in continuing measures of reforestation.

No part of the country is better suited at the present time for such a parallel upbuilding of agriculture and forestry than the South. It has large areas of fertile land which may be cleared for farming as well as other areas of nonagricultural land excellently adapted for the continuous profitable production of timber and other forest products. It has a climate especially favorable both to the production of agricultural crops and to the rapid growth of timber. The species of timber native to the region include some of our most valuable trees, the most important of which from an economic standpoint are the long-leaf pine and its near relative, the slash pine. The geographical location and the topography of the region are very favorable to the economical management of forests and to the harvesting and marketing of forest crops. There are already on the ground well-equipped established industries ready to use all of the major forest products which can be grown.

It is likely that the bulk of new settlement for many years at least will be on cut-over hardwood lands or on already cleared lands which have been abandoned. The soils on which are the hardwood forests are in general of much higher value for farming than are the pine soils, while the cost of old-field farms, which have as good soil as most of the pine lands, is considerably less than the cost of cut-over land together with the expense of clearing stumps and débris and otherwise preparing the land for cultivation. That there is a tendency not to settle up the pine lands until other and better land is all in use is indicated by the fact that although the area of improved farm land in the 10 Southern States increased nearly 18 per cent between 1900 and 1910, more than one-fourth of the 500 counties in the pine belt of these States showed a decrease in area of such land during the same period.

However, in much of the pine belt are scattered—and in some places fairly extensive—tracts of good soil which is well suited for farming. These areas can be developed and grow into prosperous permanent farm settlements only if the surrounding areas of forest land are so managed as to insure the continued existence of forest industries. No plan for employing returned soldiers in the colonization of farm lands in this region is complete if it overlooks or slights the opportunity—even the necessity—of developing in connection with them the forest soils and the permanent industries dependent on forest products.

The necessity for and the practicability of such management of pine lands of the South have been clearly recognized by Hon. Henry E. Hardtner, of Urania, a practical lumberman, who owns large tracts of pine land in central Louisiana. Mr. Hardtner has always been keenly interested in matters affecting the welfare of the South, and especially in the future use and development of the vast areas that were once covered with the timber which has played so important a part in the building up of the entire central and eastern parts of the country. For a number of years he has been studying the possibilities of the practice of forestry on these lands and has finally demonstrated that under the favorable conditions existing in the region forestry—the continuous production of forest crops—is not only a practicable but also a profitable undertaking, and that it is the key to the solution of a great part of the cut-over pineland problem of the South.

Full recognition of this fact is so essential for the wise use of these cut-over lands that I feel justified in presenting in some detail the plan which Mr. Hardtner has worked out for reforesting some 1,500 acres in Winn Parish, La., about 10 miles from Urania. This particular tract is high, dry, sandy, and slightly rolling, of the sort usually referred to as "ordinary poor pine-wood land." It was cut over in 1910 for long-leaf pine which ran some 15,000 board feet to the acre, and is still practically without young forest growth. This has been prevented from coming in by annual forest fires and by the grazing of hogs, which eat the pine mast and the young seedlings. Enough seed trees were left, however, to bring about natural reforestation if proper protection is afforded.

Mr. Hardtner plans to surround the entire 1,500 acres of hill land, and perhaps an additional 300 acres of adjacent creek-bottom lands for winter pasturage, with a substantial woven-wire fence topped by barbed wire, which will protect both seeds and seedlings from the voracious hogs. Since long-leaf pine on cut-over lands, according to Mr. Hardtner's experience, bears some seed each year he counts on natural regeneration beginning almost immediately and being complete in about six years.

Protection of the young seedlings from fire will be assured in a number of ways.

On one side of the tract a creek already serves as a natural protection, while on the other three sides roads will be built just inside the fence paralleling public roads now on the outside. Additional roads and fire lanes will be plowed throughout the tract and will furnish excellent beds for the establishment and growth of the new stand. A fire lookout tower will be built. Two men who will be given a contract to cut the pine knots and wood inside the area into suitable lengths and haul it to convenient places on the road where it is in demand at good prices will at the same time patrol the forest. Such patrol will be particularly necessary during the months of October, November, December, March, and April, and at any other time of unusual drought. Section men working on the adjacent logging railroad of the Urania Lumber Co. (Ltd.) and other employees of the company can always be called upon to help extinguish any fires that may occur.

Through the hearty cooperation of the efficient conservation commission, which is rendering such distinguished service to Louisiana, elk, buffalo, and cattle raising will go hand in hand with the forest work. This will not only be profitable in itself but will reduce the fire hazard by keeping the grass from growing too tall and by preventing too dense stands of seedlings and bushes. In the course of a year or two fire protection will result in an improvement of the grazing, and better grasses will begin to take the place of the prevailing sedge, although the latter makes fair forage when not allowed to burn over or to grow too high. English rye and other grasses will be sown in suitable spots to provide late winter and early spring grazing. The natural pasturage will take care of the cattle for at least nine months of the year, and the swamp-cane pasture along the 300 acres of creek bottom will be sufficient to carry them through the winter. To be on the safe side, however, it is planned to buy sufficient hay, grain, cottonseed meal, and hulls to feed them through the three winter months should this prove necessary. After the seedlings have been established for three years, goats of fine grades will be introduced to help keep down the bushes, and a limited number of hogs, with rings in their noses to prevent rooting, will be allowed to consume the oak, beech, and other kinds of mast, both on the hills and swamps. The general object will be to keep as much live stock on the place as can find sustenance without injury to the forest crop.

The men given the contract to work up the wood and to care for the tract in other ways will be given free use of an old farm in one corner of the area. Attached to this are several acres of good bottom land where crops can be raised and the men will also be permitted to raise some cattle and hogs of their own. The farm already has a good dwelling, with barns, outhouses, cattle shed, dipping vat, cisterns, and springs, all of which will be put in good condition. One of the springs will be enlarged into a reservoir covering several acres and will be stocked with black bass and sunfish, which will serve as a source of both pleasure and profit. A telephone and a near-by railroad station at which three logging trains and two motor cars will stop daily will keep the farm in close touch with the headquarters of the Urania Lumber Co. at Urania and with the logging operations farther out.

The initial cost of this venture is estimated as follows:

1,500 acres of land at $4 an acre	$6,000
150 head of cattle at $30	4,500
Barn	500
Roads	100
Fence	1,650
Total	12,750

During the first 15 years the sale of wood and cattle will yield annual returns as follows:

500 cords of wood at $0.50	$250
50 head of cattle at $40	2,000
Total	2,250

As against these returns there will be an annual cost of operation consisting of—

Supervision	$300
Taxes	150
Feed for cattle	900

This leaves an annual net yield of $900, or 7 per cent on the original investment.

Meanwhile the young stand established by natural reproduction from the seed trees on the area will have been growing steadily in size and density. By the end of 15 years the trees will shade the ground to such an extent as to reduce returns from cattle to a minimum. The reduced yield from grazing will, however, be counterbalanced by cutting out defective and suppressed trees. The removal of these trees will not only enable the remaining stands to grow more rapidly, but they will yield such products as posts, poles, pulpwood, and cordwood, which can be sold at a substantial net profit. There is already a good market for material of this sort, and prices will surely be considerably higher 10 or 15 years hence. The sale of these forest products, together with the returns from stock raising on a smaller scale, will maintain the annual net returns of 7 per cent upon the original investment.

By the time the stand is 25 years old the number of trees will have been reduced from 800 per acre, the number left after the first thinning, to 200 or 300. They will range from 6 to 12 inches in diameter at the stump and will be large enough to commence tapping for turpentine under the French system. Fifty trees to the acre will be tapped annually for a period of five years and then given a rest, while 50 more are worked in the same way. At the end of 20 years, when the entire area will have been covered, the wounds of the first trees tapped will have healed, and the entire operation can be repeated. Fifty cups to the acre from trees averaging 8 inches in diameter will yield 800 pounds of "dip" and "scrape," which in turn will produce 10 gallons of turpentine and 600 pounds of resin. In view of the marked increase in price that will almost certainly result from the rapid disappearance of long-leaf pine, the chief source of naval stores, under present methods of utilization it is safe to count on an annual net yield from these products of $2 per acre, or $3,000 for the entire tract.

In 60 years the trees will be large enough to cut for lumber and the entire stand can be removed, with the exception of such seed trees as must be left to start a new crop. There will now be about 150 trees to the acre, worth $300 per acre, or $450,000 for the entire tract. In other words, the original investment of $12,750, in addition to an annual net return of 7 per cent from the sale of cattle and forest products, at the end of 60 years will yield a clear profit of $450,000; or, if one does not expect to live 60 years and does not care to leave the property to his children, he can use it as collateral for a loan, or can sell it for many times the amount originally invested.

So enthusiastic is Mr. Hardtner over the wonderful opportunities offered by cut-over lands in the South, provided they are used for the purpose to which they are best adapted, that he does not hesitate to advise western farmers to sell their high-priced lands, invest the proceeds in southern cut-over lands, and handle them along lines similar to those outlined above. Not only would such a procedure prove profitable financially, but would give the owner the immeasurable satisfaction of feeling that he had built where others had destroyed; that he had contributed to the welfare of the future as well as of the present.

Certainly there is no gainsaying the fact that in the South, and I believe equally in other forest regions of the country, the colonization of farm and forest lands should go hand in hand. To ignore the forest lands would be to overlook an opportunity for the establishment of wood-using industries that are not only valuable in themselves, but that can contribute greatly to the successful development of the strictly agricultural lands. Furthermore, it is my firm belief that steps to maintain the productivity and to secure the full use of our forest lands should not be limited to colonization projects. Under present methods of utilization some 9,000,000 acres are being added each year to the quarter of a billion acres of cut-over forest lands on which little or no growth of valuable species is taking place. Constantly mounting prices for lumber, accompanied by the decay and even the disappearance of communities dependent upon the forest and wood-using industries, are bringing home to us the fact that such prodigal waste can no longer be afforded even by a country as rich in natural resources as the United States. Prompt action must be taken if we are to preserve our forest heritage. The lumbermen are only too willing to change their present methods of exploitation, which have largely been forced upon them by economic conditions, if they can be assured of guidance and cooperation from the Nation and the States.

The outlines of a broad national forest policy upon which all interests can agree have recently been sketched in a number of speeches and publications by Col. Henry S. Graves, Chief of the United States Forest Service. Col. Graves would safeguard the future of our timber supplies by a considerable expansion of the publicly owned forests—Federal, State, and municipal—and by requiring the protection and regeneration of privately owned forests. This means simply that the Federal and State Governments would work out together arrangements by which it would be made mandatory for private owners to protect their forests from fire and to adopt such simple silvicultural measures at the time of cutting as might be necessary to secure a new crop of forest trees. In return the public would grant liberal assistance to private owners in the protection and management of their forests. Such a program would of course apply uniformly to all forest lands and would afford a practical means of maintaining the productivity of one of our most valuable natural resources without undue hardship on either the present owners or the general public.

I hope very much that the proposed legislation providing homes for soldiers will not only include the utilization of forest as well as farm lands, but will in the near future be supplemented by legislation that will lay the foundation for a really comprehensive and effective permanent national-forest policy. It is difficult to exaggerate how much the establishment of such a policy would mean to the welfare of the entire Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the chairman of the committee yield some of his time?

Mr. KIESS. I yield so much to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] as he may require.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to call attention to the fact that this printing bill is a practical proposition and one on which both the House and Senate have been at work for years. Members who have been here in recent Congresses will remember that the former chairman of the Printing Committee, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Barnhart, gave much time to the details of a bill similar to this. That bill was considered on various Calendar Wednesdays, was amended, and was improved in numerous details, but never passed both branches of the same Congress. It has seemed a pity that the Congress of the United States has had to work of recent years with antiquated laws concerning its printing at a time when the quantity of printed matter was so greatly enlarged.

During all these years, following the organization, I think in 1912, of a commission on printing reform, an effort has been made to pass this bill or some other similar bill and get the distribution of Government printed matter on an equitable basis which would make for actual economy. To-day the great Government Printing Office is actually strained in the effort to keep up with the printed matter called for. This bill carries many what you might call administrative paragraphs for perfection of details for economies in the Government Printing Office and doing away with waste printing. As the chairman of the committee has said, it will easily save this Government one-half million dollars a year. I am inclined to believe that all Members will when they have studied it be pleased with the exchange plan for distribution of documents. When the time comes for discussion of that there will be quite a bit of debate and the whole thing will be explained; but it will be interesting to Members to know that, for instance, the Agricultural Yearbook, of which you now receive 812 copies, allotted to you through the document room, if this bill becomes a law you will be entitled to order, if you so desire, several times that number of Yearbooks. But if you come from a metropolitan district and do not care for Yearbooks, you can take a credit for other printed matter and not take the Yearbooks. Where the Yearbooks now cost anywhere from 75 to 90 cents per copy, it is proposed by this act to strike out extraneous matter and let the report of the Secretary of Agriculture be printed separately and not in the Yearbook, thus reducing the cost of the Yearbook to about 50 cents, which will thus permit more to be placed to the Member's credit. The bill carries many other reforms, and I sincerely hope that on this Calendar Wednesday we will be able to get right along with the reading of the bill. If Members will look at the report, they will find, commencing on page 7, I believe, a detailed explanation of the bill by paragraphs and a clear and careful examination of each new proposal and the necessity therefor.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As I understood, when we had the Barnhart bill up here there was a prorating for public documents of about $1,800 to each Member.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Now, if I understand it, this bill will give each Member of Congress the right to have the $1,800 invested in different public documents that he may deem best for his district?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is one thing. Now, with reference to the stationery of Members. Does it go into that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I believe the plan proposed is this or something like this: A Member of the House now who is not a chairman of a committee is obliged to buy his stationery at the stationery room and pay the price for blank paper in excess of that at which it would be sold at the Government Printing Office. So when a Member not a chairman of a committee buys the paper which he is going to have printed—his name, and so forth—he pays too much for it in view of the fact the Government buys paper in enormous contracts. There is no reason why a Member should pay more for paper than the Secretary of the Interior, so under this plan his paper will come from the Government Printing Office paper and be charged to his stationery account.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does this bill make any change in regard to the RECORDS allotted to each Member?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not at present. It is proposed, as the gentleman will discover when he examines the bill, to require the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be more nearly an actual record of the proceedings of the House and the Senate, which I think most of us agree is what it should be, and that will reduce the size of the RECORD greatly and the reduction in size will reduce the cost of printing and ultimately we can give a Member more copies to distribute, which I think will be wise.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Suppose a Member decides that he wants more copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to his credit than 57, or a less number, would that same plan apply under your bill to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it does to any other public document?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been left outside of the distribution. We hope as we reduce the general cost of congressional printing—and this deals with congressional printing and not with departmental printing—to make the situation such that we can in the course of time order an increased number of CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman says that it does not deal with departmental printing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that we could have a more or less number of Yearbooks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a method of distribution.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That this deals with?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. When I say "departmental" I do not refer to books and documents that Congress orders printed and distributed to each Member. This changes the plan of distribution.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It leaves it to the Member to decide what he wants?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. Let me say to the gentleman the plan of exchange is the same plan, practically, as that which prevails at the Geological Survey. That bureau has, as the gentleman knows, expensive quadrangle maps, and that there is a certain number relating to the gentleman's State placed to my credit and for which I can have no possible use. It used to be that if we got together in some way or other we could make an exchange. I could get what the gentleman has relating to my State and he could obtain what I have which belongs to his State. That was a roundabout process. As the Members became busier and busier the publications piled up. The Geological Survey inaugurated a modern exchange system. We hope to have that with other documents.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Under the plan of this bill, as I understand it, it is proposed to eliminate the extraneous matter from the RECORD—matter not germane?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Matter not germane, as nearly as it possibly can be worked out. When a man asks to extend his remarks on such and such a subject, the remarks must be on such and such a subject, and nothing extraneous included.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think, if he will indulge me further, that the extension of remarks should be restricted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the intention and a fair plan is offered. It is proposed under this bill to have a printing clerk attached to the machinery of both House and Senate, one clerk for each. The Senate now has one to take charge of all sorts of little printing matters that come up every day. Take, for instance, the case here recently of the introduction of the Sims bill carrying the Plumb plan. The publicity given to that made the supply of the copies of that bill run out in two days. To secure a reprint required an order from the Clerk of the House or from the document room, and probably a further authorization from the Joint Committee on Printing, an unnecessary routine for necessary printing. This bill carries methods to simplify that and to save time, to save money, to save white paper, and to get along with the business of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to use no further time now.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the subject of the high cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent to speak on a subject other than this bill during the few minutes I have.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to send a letter to the desk in reference to the coal situation and have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CRUCIBLE STEEL CO. OF AMERICA,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 12, 1919.

Hon. M. M. GARLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is very apparent that the business of the country will in the near future suffer very greatly from lack of fuel as a result of inability of shippers and consumers to obtain cars in sufficient number to lay in a reasonable reserve of coal and coke at points of consumption. Consequently, to put it mildly, it seems unpardonable that, as is generally known, there should be standing at various points on the railroads some 50,000 or more new empty cars that are sorely needed at this very moment.

The reason these cars are not available for service, we are told, is because the Government has not reached a satisfactory conclusion with the railroads and the car builders for financing their purchase.

There has been more or less talk in the papers about the Government's taking the necessary action to secure release of these cars, but I understand little or no progress is being made.

It is quite evident that unless you and some others who clearly appreciate the seriousness of the situation and its importance to the country as a whole get back of the movement and impress upon the Government the necessity for action these cars will remain where they are, and as a result a few months hence thousands of American workmen will be out of employment because the plants in which they are engaged are unable to operate through lack of fuel. Not only this, but there will be a great deal of suffering among the people because of shortage of coal with which to keep their homes heated when the cold weather sets in.

Yours, very truly, C. G. WHARTON, President.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a warning letter of a kind of which I have received many recently. This is one of the largest employing companies in the country, employing thousands and thousands of men everywhere throughout the United States, and paying the highest wages, inasmuch as it is very skilled work. The situation presents itself to you now that we have not the carrying capacity. In many places mines are shut down for want of cars, or are working only part time, and it will be but a few months when we are up against a situation like we were year before last unless something is done to relieve it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not this just illustrate the necessity of this Congress in the near future taking some action that will prevent any interference whatever with interstate traffic when it means women and children freezing to death in the winter, when it means the closing up of factories, when cars to be loaded with coal are stopped by reason of interference with interstate traffic?

Mr. GARLAND. Something should be done which is more efficient than the operation of the railroads at this time under the Railroad Administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have heard here a number of references within the past few days to the Adamson law. One gentleman was quite impatient over the discussion and referred to the subject as water that had long since gone over the wheel. It is not my purpose to discuss now either the Adamson law or the circumstances of its passage, and the merits of the law have no relation to what I have to say. But I submit that the gentleman was in error in his attitude toward the discussion. While the Adamson law was passed nearly three years ago, under pressure and on the eve of a presidential election, it is to-day again on the lips of men all over the country; and, of course, there is a reason for that.

The country faces another railroad crisis. The great railroad brotherhoods are before the President and Congress with increased wage demands and with a plan of railroad ownership and management. The air is surcharged with forebodings as to what may happen if these demands are not promptly met.

Under circumstances such as these certainly no word should be spoken on this floor that is not spoken with a sober sense of the interests and the issues involved. It is no time for careless talk.

That the spirit and purpose in which I speak may not be misconstrued, may I say at the outset that I am a believer in labor unions. Labor not only has a right to organize and to do collective bargaining, but it had to do it in self-defense against the intolerable abuses of capitalistic power and greed. I believe in the eight-hour day, in a high wage scale, and in the best possible working and living conditions; and any man who can not see that labor is going to have a larger share in the fruits of production is blind to what is going on in the world; and if he can not welcome this better day for labor there is something warped in his make-up. One of the things the Great War means is that more and more the controlling factor in fixing the fabric of society is to be human welfare—the large rights of the individual man.

But every true friend of labor must hear with real concern the program of threat and intimidation advanced by some false prophets of labor. [Applause.] Do not misunderstand me. Mr. Plumb and others of the leaders earnestly disavow such purposes, and they can render no greater service to organized labor than to stand steadfastly against any such methods. Certainly I do not believe that the great body of railroad men, who are splendid American citizens, are in sympathy with violence. But the talk of threat is in the air. Members are even receiving threats against their life if they do not follow a certain course. Under such circumstances I think it is well that we keep some fundamental things clear before ourselves and before the country. The purpose and the mood of this Congress should be clearly understood on a matter of this sort.

Let the country understand that we are saying to the brotherhoods something like this: "We welcome the presentation of your claims and your plans. We recognize your interests and we expect to hear you fully and sympathetically. But your claims must come solely upon their merits and with no threats attached." [Applause.]

Let us not forget the unorganized laborers of this country—the laborers on the farm, in the shop, the store, the office. [Applause.] There must be no special favors to any class merely because that class is organized and holds political power. Any settlement of the claims of organized labor must be made in the light of the interests of all the laborers, of all the people of this country.

If there is anything needed to-day, when all the world is seething with unrest, it is respect for law [applause] and fearless and impartial enforcement of law. And without the latter it is hard to maintain the former. Within the past few days we are told that the profiteers are now to be vigorously prosecuted. This is good to hear, however tardy the action may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOCH. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. KIESS. I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HOCH. While the people sacrificed and the Nation's sons laid down their lives and the ever-mounting cost of living brought burdens almost too heavy to be borne, sleek scoundrels waxed fat out of Government contracts, trafficked in the dire necessities of men, and have been unmolested. The law is ample and has been ample. The way to promote regard for orderly government is to enforce the law.

The supremacy of law, the integrity of legislative action, the inviolability of constitutional government—these things are fundamental and there is no price too great too pay to maintain them. Could we ever afford to abdicate orderly government because disaster threatened? We might buy temporary relief, but when we did it we would but bank the coals for future conflagration, the extent of which no man could foretell.

Certainly no man is a true friend of labor who would tear down the orderly processes of legislation. In the long run the welfare of organized labor will rest upon fair investigation, upon full knowledge of the facts, upon orderly government under the liberty and opportunities which our free institutions have made possible. Any man who leads any class of American citizens, whether they be farmers, or business men, or railroad men, and however just their demands, to think that he does them high favor when he procures what they ask without investigation and at the sacrifice of honest legislative processes will in the end be written down by history as their enemy and not their friend. Government by duress is no government.

Let it be understood now and forever that there is no place in this country for class control. Class control is simply autocracy by another name. Let it be understood now and forever that there is no room in America for footpad legislation.

Lenin and Trotski are not wanted in the land of Washington and of Lincoln. You can never put democracy into industry by putting Bolshevism into government. And the time to hit Bolshevism is every time it raises its head. [Applause.]

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask my colleague [Mr. MCCLINTIC] to use some time.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak on another subject than the one pending here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use the time allotted to me in discussing the effort that is being made by the potash interest to get favorable report from the Ways and Means Committee on a bill to license or put a tariff on potash and thereby tax the American farmer who uses guano containing potash.

Clearly this is not an effort to help the farmer, but is an effort to hurt the farmer.

It is an artful device to injure the farmer in order to help the owners of the potash industry in America. It was not seriously contended at the hearing of this matter before the Committee on Ways and Means that this duty on potash is essential to raise money for the Government. It was openly admitted then and is now admitted that the purpose of this proposed legislation is to keep out of this country German and Alsatian potash, so as to allow the potash producers of this country, without let or hindrance, fleece the American farmer.

Of course the advocates of this measure do not speak of its effect, except by way of camouflage. They talk of protecting the potash industry. They want to protect the potash producers from all competition, so they can sell potash to the farmers without competition.

This is an effort not to take money from the farmers for the Government but to take money from the farmers for the pockets of the potash producers.

This is taxation not for governmental purposes but for and in behalf of corporate interests.

Shall this Government stand guard and protect the potash industry from competition, while that interest takes from the farmer his hard-earned rights?

Shall this Government guard the ways of escape and help and protect the moneyed interests, while that interest, like a band of bandits or gang of buccaneers of old, make war upon innocent men, women, and children of the farm and take from them property that is justly theirs?

The supporters of this measure are awfully afraid of German potash. They try to scare us with the word "German." Well, the people of this country never did run from that word and never will. The truth is we are not the running kind. If our boys ran at all they did not run from the Germans. They ran at the Germans. [Applause.]

If the advocates of this provision are deathly afraid of German potash, then suppose they let us have a good, cheap supply of French potash. France now owns Alsace and her valuable potash industry. But they say they want to build up a potash industry in this country so when another war comes we will have potash at home.

My! my! What argument. Here is hoping we have no more wars.

The truth is if we do have another war it will probably not be with Germany, and certainly it will not be with France. So we can get all the potash we want, even if war does come.

Then, again, if the potash industry in this country can not live without robbing the farmers, while the Government approvingly stands by, a particeps criminis, then, I say, let the potash industry die, and the sooner the better.

Oh, but they whine and say they lost money in the potash industry during the war. Well, suppose they did. The farmer does not owe the money to them. Millions of people lost either property, money, or life during the war. Who is going to pay all this? You can not put this world back where she was prior to the war.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. If the American people can get wheat cheaper from Argentina than from the American farmer, do you think they ought to be permitted to do so?

Mr. LANKFORD. That is another question.

Mr. DENISON. It is right along in the line of the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. LANKFORD. I am in favor of that legislation which will give foodstuffs to the American people at the cheapest price and reduce the cost of living.

Mr. DENISON. Well, then, if the American people can get all the wheat and flour they need from the Argentine, and it will give us cheaper wheat and flour than we can buy from the American farmers, or cheaper than we can raise it and sell it, do you think that ought to be permitted to be done?

Mr. LANKFORD. The trouble is when you use a protective tariff you protect one and rob the other class.

Mr. DENISON. Do you think the American farmer should be protected from cheap foreign competition?

Mr. LANKFORD. I am not in favor of helping the potash industry to the detriment of the farmer.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to ask you, referring to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], if the potash used by the American farmer in producing wheat is made very much higher to them on account of this tariff, would it enable them any more successfully to compete with the Argentine wheat grower?

Mr. LANKFORD. It would not do it.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. POU. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is not pertinent anyway, because the potash discovered in this country, as I am informed, is no good, and they are proceeding to protect a commodity which is in no way comparable with the Alsace potash, and it is not a comparative case at all, because I know of crops that have been ruined by the use of this American potash.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, if the potash produced in this country can not be used, there should be no protection given to it.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, will some one kindly rise up and tell me who is to pay the farmer for the loss in his farming operations occasioned by the lack of help caused by his sons being away in the service of their country?

Who is to pay that mother for those boys that never will come back?

Who is to pay that wife for the husband that never will again greet her in this life?

Yes; tell me who is to pay that beautiful little baby girl and wonderful little boy for the loss of a father's kisses, kind caresses, and love?

Yes; tell me all this, and then tell me should the farmer's barefoot boy—God bless him—and the farmer's pure, sweet sunkissed and sun-tanned girl, the purest and sweetest of womanhood, pay the potash millionaire his supposed war losses?

Shall that farmer who gave his sons to die for yonder flag pay that penalty to the potash magnates? Shall the returned soldier who owns a little farm pay it? Shall that widow, whose only son sleeps where the poppies grow in Flanders fields, pay that cash assessment?

Tell me, shall that wife, trying to support those little children with her little farm, pay money to appease the greed for gold of the immensely rich?

Yes; you will tell me and tell them by your vote. What will it be?

Mr. Chairman, what are we about to do? Will this Congress tax the farmer and give the tax to the potash interests?

I can not persuade myself into believing the majority of this Congress will stand for it. We had farmers in this country before we had any cities, before we had any railroads or corporate interests, and before we had a Nation.

The truth is, the development of the farming interest and the farmer's efforts made possible the cities, railroads, Nation, and all that is worth while.

Mr. Chairman, did any man or set of men, whether in this Congress or elsewhere in this Nation, ever before seriously, purposely, and understandingly propose to tax and penalize the farmer, the hand that builded this Nation, that saved this Nation in its direst calamity, and that is now feeding and clothing this Nation and giving it its very lifeblood?

A penalty to be inflicted only in the event our farmers continue to make food for our consumption and clothing for our backs. A penalty which is not to be collected provided our farmers leave off feeding and clothing the people of our great Nation and leave us to suffer and to die.

Can it be possible?

Are we to fight the hand that is feeding us?

You had as well argue to me that it is natural for humanity to hate its greatest benefactors; you had as well argue to me that it is natural for a man to hate, despise, and murder the mother that gave him birth, as to argue to me that the sober-thinking people of this Nation want to penalize and assess a cash fine against the farmers of this country for feeding and clothing us. Are we to penalize effort and labor? Are we to assess a fine payable in cash against the farmer for earning his bread and our bread by the sweat of his brow? God forbid.

We had as well tax morality and virtue and pension lasciviousness and vice; we had as well assess a cash fine against honest effort and endeavor and grant a bonus to the vagabond and the vagrant, as to penalize our farmers for being farmers and giving us the necessaries of life, and by our legislation help the immensely rich and the big corporations who are able to build and own great potash industries in this country.

We must raise revenue to run the Government, but let us not tax the farmers' efforts to lower the cost of living by producing more foodstuffs. Let us help the farmer instead of hindering him. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the Republican chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, can not urge that it is essential to levy a duty on potash in order to raise revenue. That gentleman busied himself very much on the 31st of May trying to repeal the luxury tax law and thus deprive the Government of approximately $100,000,000 per annum. I wonder what the gentleman from Michigan has against the farmers anyway.

On the 31st of May he was so anxious to repeal the tax on luxuries until he wedged in ahead of the farmers' bill—the Agricultural appropriation bill—and delayed it, and filled up several pages of the RECORD with heartbroken remarks in behalf of the unfortunate man who pays more than $5 per square yard for a carpet, more than $10 for a picture frame, more than $50 for a trunk, more than $25 for a suit case, and who, poor fellow, carries his greenbacks in a pocketbook costing more than $7.50.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. LANKFORD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] no doubt tossed in his bed through the weary hours of the long night, fearing that some poor unfortunate human being would go without light by night if he or she had to pay a tax on a lamp shade costing over $25.

No doubt he could see millions of people getting sunburned if he did not speedily get repealed the tax on umbrellas costing over $4, and a whole Nation suffering without a fan to cool their brows as long as a tax was left on fans costing over $1 each.

I am so glad I was reared in the land of the good old palmetto fan. My very affectionate friend need not worry any more about the fan question so far as the people of my section are concerned. It is a genuine pleasure to get real warm with a palmetto fan close by.

Say, did any of you fellows ever plow until there was not a dry thread on you and then get in the shade of a tree for a few breaths of rest and fan with your hat just a little? That is the sweetest fanning in the whole world. If you ever enjoyed this exquisite few seconds of rest you would not worry about the man who pays a tax on a fan costing over a dollar; and that is not all; you would not vote to put a tax on a man who does plow simply because he tries to make fertile the land which he plows.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee suffers, no one knows how much, because there is yet a tax of 10 per cent on all that a lounging robe costs over $7.50.

My good friends, the farmers, after a hard day's work, can rest without a lounging robe. I am not worried about the tax a man pays on a $10 lounging robe so much as I am worried about the proposed tax on the men and women, boys and girls who toil on a farm and who would not pay $1 a thousand for lounging robes for lounging purposes. [Laughter and applause.]

I really sympathize with the gentleman from Michigan who takes so much to heart the awful wrong of a tax of 10 per cent on the excess price of ladies' hats costing over $15 and men's hats costing over $5, boys' caps costing over $2, and men's, women's, misses', and boys' shoes costing over $10.

No doubt the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee prophesies that a great calamity will befall this country if we leave a tax on men's neckties costing over $2, men's and boys' socks costing over $1 a pair, ladies' silk stockings costing over $2 per pair, and on kimonas costing over $15.

He is very much concerned about those who wear silk socks and stockings, but at the same time willing to tax the barefoot boy of the farm.

He is concerned about the lady with the $15 hat and $15 kimona, with the silk hosiery, and begs for her to be relieved from a tax, but is willing to tax the girl with the sunbonnet, the checked apron, and sensible dress of the farm.

Well, I must admit I can not agree with him, and I can never believe, until I am shown by positive proof, that a majority of this House are in accord with the chairman on this question.

Can it be that this is a sample of the Republican legislation that we are to get?

When the question of taxing potash was up for consideration before the Committee on Ways and Means, the chairman of that committee said he had the interest of the farmers in mind. That reminds me of the old darkey who had the farmer's chickens in mind when he visited the farmer's chicken roost one night about 2 o'clock and misplaced some of the farmer's choice hens so that the farmer never could locate them again. [Applause.]

The farmers rather that people who want to legislate against them would not have their interest so much in mind. Please forget about their interests if you are against them, they will fare better.

Again, the gentleman from Michigan says he wants to help the farmer out.

That is the trouble now. They have been helped out too much. They rather for us to help them in just a little.

This measure proposes to help them out of their hard-earned dues and proposes to help the potash interests into the use of the rights taken from the farmers.

This measure is not in the interest of the farmer. I hope it will not be favorably reported by the committee; and if it is favorably reported out of the committee, I hope the bill will be defeated by this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. One complaint sent to me about the potash situation was the great export duty Germany levied on her exports of potash, making it cost so much more to our country. Now, this bill proposes to do by impost just what Germany did by an export duty?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to commend the Printing Committee, including in its membership my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC], for bringing forward the bill, H. R. 8362, being the bill to regulate the public printing. I commend this committee, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that they have explained to me that this bill means a step toward economy and a step toward cutting out the multiplication of printing.

And in this connection I want to say that I congratulate this Congress on the fact that this report intimates that members of some committees have begun to study expenditures of money as well as the collection of taxes. It has been my observation that for many years there have been great associations studying how to raise taxes and to raise revenue, but not many of them have ever given any thought to the scientific expenditure of money. I want to call attention to the fact that it makes no difference to the individual financially whether his money is taken from him at the point of a polished revolver or in the name of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, some two years ago I was appointed a member of a committee of the national tax conference to study the expenditure of moneys in public government; and, Mr. Chairman, we found that there is extant too much of an idea in this country that government is made to live on and not under. [Applause.] In that study, Mr. Chairman, we were somewhat handicapped by the war coming on, and naturally, as laymen do, we turned toward public officials to present our criticisms. We gave study to the congressional printing, and while I have not the figures with me now, I want to say to you that, from the standpoint of a layman, what we brought out in that study of congressional printing was astonishing to us as taxpayers.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have discovered since becoming a Member of this body that no Member of that Congress or of this Congress was or is responsible for that great expenditure. It is the fault of the present law and system, and it is that law and system, I think, that this bill seeks to remedy. [Applause.]

And while I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, as this bill is intended to cut out multiplication and increase economy, I want to urge upon the Members of this Congress and each committee of this House that we go further toward the end of cutting out multiplication and establishing economy in governmental functions. I want to suggest that, as this bill does, there can be great savings made in other ways by cutting out multiplication of employees and materials, both in National, State, and city governments.

Mr. Chairman, the analysis of public expenditure by the committee of the national conference to which I refer brought out several other matters of duplication in government, which can and must be remedied. In that analysis we discovered that in one State in this Union there were over 1,100 men employed in doing the same class of work, but employed under different departments of government. For instance, every city had a health department, every county had a health department, the State had a health department, and the National Government had a health department, every one of them having rules in conflict with the others, with the result that through these conflicting rules of these health departments about the only person who was successful in his operations relative to the health of the community was the undertaker. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. We also discovered that in that same State the State was attempting to remove the ticks from the cattle. The State had 60 men traveling under salaries of $100 a month each and an expense account eradicating the ticks and we found that the National Government had 70 men traveling over that State with like expense accounts doing the same thing. These two branches of the Government had different ideas as to the size of the vats. They had different ideas as to the kind of solution in which the cow was to be dipped, with the result that when they got together and started to work the cow had died of old age and the ravages of the tick. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, as this bill has been reported for economy and the cutting out of a multiplication of Government expenses, many more bills can and must be reported out for the purpose of cutting out duplications before we can reduce taxes and through reduced taxation help reduce the high cost of living. I hope this bill will pass unanimously and be an entering wedge for real economy. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Could not this bill properly provide for the curtailment of the expense to which this Government is put every year in the printing of these voluminous reports from the various departments that are piled up year after year and are never read by any person in this Government?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Texas that in the remarks I made in opening the discussion of this bill I stated that the committee felt that previous bills had failed to pass Congress because they had tried to cover too much ground, and that in presenting this bill, regulating particularly the congressional printing, and calling it the congressional printing act, we thought we could have it passed at this time without serious opposition. Furthermore, I stated that we proposed to draft other legislation covering the matter to which the gentleman from Texas refers.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that not long ago I wanted to find out exactly what there was to my credit in the folding room in the way of these reports, and I had them sent to my office. It would take two wagonloads to haul them all; some of them are books of nearly a thousand pages, and if they are ever opened by any Member of Congress or anybody else I have never heard of it. Of course, once in a while there are reports that are important. But the great majority of them are absolutely valueless and a waste and should be discontinued and this enormous expense stopped. There is no better time to stop it than right now, and I hope that the committee will take appropriate action by adding a proper amendment.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has a very intelligent and discriminating constituency. I would suggest that he get all these reports and send them out to his constituents.

Mr. BLANTON. In the wintertime, when fuel is scarce, they would probably use them for fuel.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is doing his constituents a great injustice by that remark, because I know they are intelligent.

Mr. BLANTON. My constituents are highly intelligent. What on earth would my constituents want with a thousand-page report from the Department of Commerce, the Department of Justice, the Interior Department, or even the Agricultural Department? These reports are never read by anyone. I do not refer to the Yearbooks. They want the Yearbooks, but I refer to these annual reports that are two-thirds of them copies of some preceding report.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If the gentleman will refer to page 21 of the bill, he will find that there is a great list of reports that are cut out.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to section 22, which will, I believe, reduce the number of reports. I also wish to say to him that the valuation feature of this bill will permit Members to have what documents they want for their own use, rather than to take those that are allotted to them under the present plan. This will have a tendency to reduce the number of the reports printed, as they will not be printed unless the Members make request for same. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the printing of so many copies is unnecessary.

Mr. ELSTON. The larger part of the expense consists in the paper and in the printing itself.

Mr. KIESS. Of course, Mr. Chairman, a large part of the expense is in the setting up of the type from which these reports are printed. The gentleman will understand that the paper used and the labor in the printing of the additional copies also adds greatly to the expense. Under section 22 we provide for a reduction in the number of reports to be issued.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] a few moments ago presented a letter from one of his constituents complaining of a shortage in coal cars and stating that the result would be a shortage in coal this winter. The view of the correspondent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is one that quite commonly prevails among the people.

It is an impression that has been carefully fostered by certain coal interests. I should say by way of explanation that the bituminous coal operators of the United States are organized in what is called the National Coal Association, of which Harry N. Taylor, of Kansas City, is president. The directors of that association held a meeting at the Linton Hotel in Cincinnati on June 10 last and appropriated $50,000 with which to carry on a "buy-coal-now" campaign, as a part of which advertisements were published in some 400 newspapers throughout the country. This advertising and other printed propaganda claimed, among other things, that there was a car shortage and a shortage of labor, which had caused and would continue to cause a great decrease in coal production. Hardly a single statement of fact made in that propaganda was true. Practically all of it was false. Nevertheless it was carried on just the same, and the $50,000 was divided up among the newspapers, in return for which the advertisements were printed, as well as much news and editorial matter in certain venal publications. The impression was left upon the people that these factors mentioned in this propaganda will result in a coal shortage this winter. Of course, the public generally have been considerably misled.

Mr. Chairman, I myself believe that there will be a coal shortage, but none of these factors will enter into it. The trouble is simply that the coal operators are demanding an extortionate price for their product and the people will not buy it. They think the price is too high, and the result is that they are not stocking up on coal. The propaganda has failed. It resulted in a temporary stimulation of the coal market for a few weeks, but people soon found out that it was a false propaganda, and they quit buying. The $50,000 appropriated to finance the campaign has been spent, and the National Coal Association has decided to suspend its propaganda. At a meeting of its directors held in Kansas City on July 10 it was decided to abandon the propaganda. The Pittsburgh bituminous coal interests were insistent that the "buy-now" campaign should be abandoned, and it was agreed at that meeting that there would be no further effort to stimulate coal buying, that the business would be allowed to run along at the present prices, that no effort would be made to overcome the shortage in production, but that when the snow begins to fly and the people to clamor for coal they would go into the market and would then find a coal shortage, and that then these operators would be able to put up the price to the skies and make a big killing in profits, on account of the shortage in coal. That is the situation, and the people of the country ought to know about it.

I want to say, furthermore, that, in my opinion, there is nothing that is going to stay this infamous plot to take advantage of the suffering of women and children this winter and of the idleness that will be caused by industries shutting down, except action by Congress, and I insist that Congress shall take some action upon this subject. I insist that Congress pass a law which will put it out of the power of coal operators to profiteer during the coming winter. I insist that the price of coal shall be limited by law, and that there shall be no opportunity to increase the price when suffering comes on this winter.

The constituent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] labors under a very natural mistake. That impression has been very carefully fostered by this coal organization. But what are the facts? I have here a letter dated July 19, 1919, from Mr. W. T. Tyler, Director of the Division of Operations, United States Railroad Administration, in which, speaking of coal, he says:

The low production in the present year thus far is due almost entirely to lack of market. This is amply shown by the weekly reports of the Geological Survey, which for months past have shown that the mines have lost 30 to 40 per cent of working time on account of no market, while the loss on account of car shortage has never reached 5 per cent and seldom went over 3 per cent.

Not a shortage of coal cars, but no market for the coal, "no market" due to the extortionate prices that are being demanded for coal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I continue the reading of the letter:

The low production in 1919 is the direct result of this condition, and is emphasized by the fact that up to the same date—July 5—the production in 1918 was 295,000,000 tons.

Listen now to this, for these are the facts:

The fact is that the railroads are in much better shape than they were for several years preceding the war. We now have more than 4,000 locomotives in good repair stored and ready for service, whereas at no time during the two years preceding the war did any such condition exist. There are on the railroads under Federal control 975,851 coal cars, and during the week of June 14, 1919, the average in bad order was only 9 per cent, and this 9 per cent included a large number of light coal cars actually withdrawn from service but not taken off the books. The system adopted by the Railroad Administration classes cars as being in bad order when they are undergoing only light repairs as well as heavy repairs. While figures on the same basis are not available for the years preceding the war, there can be no question but what the situation in this respect is more favorable now than it was then.

So, Mr. Chairman, the condition as to cars is much better than it ever has been. There is no excuse for a coal shortage on account of a shortage in transportation, and that part of a propaganda is absolutely false. Of course, the labor troubles for the past two weeks have affected the car situation, but with the men going back to work, unless there should be a further suspension of work in the future, this slight disturbance of the transportation situation will soon be overcome. That we have plenty of coal cars does not mean, however, that we are going to have plenty of coal when winter comes.

The prospect actually is that these operators will go on charging their extortionate prices for coal and that the people of the country will not put it in their cellars, hoping that Congress will come to their rescue and bring down the price to what it ought to be. Then when winter comes we will have shivering women and children, and the coal operators will have the opportunity they are looking forward to, which is to spring their prices to the skies and skin the people to the very last cent they can get out of them. The statement of Mr. Tyler, of the Railroad Administration, as to the cause for the slump in coal production is borne out by a letter, dated July 17, which I received from Director Smith, of the Geological Survey, in which he says:

The information contained in the weekly bulletins, particularly that in the table on page 3, each week shows that the reason for the decrease in the production of bituminous coal is lack of market, or "no demand," as it is classified in that table. The same is true for the anthracite, although the details have not been compiled in the same manner as for bituminous coal.

Another feature of the coal operators' propaganda was the statement that there was a shortage in labor; that alien miners were going back to Europe by thousands, and so on. In refutation of this I have a letter from Director General Densmore, of the United States Employment Service:

MY DEAR MR. HUDDLESTON:

1. Acknowledgment is made of your communication under date of July 12, in which you requested information regarding labor conditions in the coal-mining industry.

2. There are approximately 1,000,000 men employed in and around the bituminous and anthracite coal mines. Ever since the armistice was signed thousands of miners have been idle. Unemployment has been keenly felt in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and the southwestern districts. Production of bituminous coal has decreased for the period ending June 28, 1919, from 212,000,000 as compared with 284,000,000 for the same period in 1918 and the production of anthracite coal from 49,000,000 to 38,000,000 tons.

3. This is due to the fact that coal mines have been shut down and thousands of men have been forced out of employment. The coal operators allege that this idleness is caused because there has been no market for coal.

4. Unemployment in certain sections of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio is such as to create distress and want among a large number of miners and their families.

5. There are approximately the same number of men employed in and around the coal mines now as there were in 1918. In some sections, due to idleness, Italians and Slavs from Europe have returned to their native land, but this has been offset by the return of thousands of men who served in the Army and Navy during the war.

Very truly, yours, J. B. DENSMORE, Director General.

I regret that the time I have will not admit that I go more fully into the subject. The situation demands immediate action by Congress. We should make these avaricious coal operators know now that they will not be permitted to raise their prices when cold weather has come.

There is neither a car shortage nor is there a labor shortage, but there is a shortage in common humanity and honesty on the part of the coal operators of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield 23 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

[Mr. HEFLIN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if the very noisy and windy speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] contains no more fact than the assertion or the idea he is trying to convey here that the page advertisement of the Friends of Irish Freedom and Associated Societies that appears in the Washington Post this morning is paid for by munition manufacturers, by rifle and other gun makers, also German money, then his speech will have but little influence or effect on the thinking people of America. If there is no more reliable information elsewhere in his speech than in his statement that the money to pay for this advertisement and other page advertisements appearing in the Washington papers came from such a source, then his speech is not worth the paper it is printed on. [Applause.]

Now, the truth of the matter is that the money that pays for these advertisements is gathered up at public demonstrations in every part of the United States, and it is subscribed generously and willingly by the liberty-loving people of America [applause]; and the organizations under whose auspices these great demonstrations are being held are working for the freedom, independence, and self-determination of Ireland. They are laboring to further the hope that was conveyed to them by the leader of his party and the head of the present administration, who said: "The purposes of the United States in this war are known to the whole world—to every people to whom the truth has been permitted to come." We did not enter this war for any selfish purpose of our own, but to "bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." Is it any wonder, then, that the Friends of Irish Freedom and friends of liberty everywhere believe—and they have a right to believe—that the claims of the people of Ireland would be given proper consideration at the end of the war, and also that they would rightfully be given an opportunity to properly present their claims to the peace conference? His speech is unfair and his reference to these advertisements is unwise and uncalled for, and it will not make any impression on this House or anybody who reads it. Let me read you the advertisement he refers to:

A CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION AND A PERSONAL QUESTION AS WELL.

Are you willing to delegate to foreigners the power to send your boys to war?

The Constitution of the United States provides that in the Congress (the Senate and the House of Representatives) shall reside the power to declare war.

The proposed league of nations provides that the representatives of the signatory powers shall have the power to make war, and that such decision shall be binding upon the members of the league.

The treaty-making power resides in the President and Senate—so the House of Representatives has nothing to say about ratification of the proposed league of nations—has not even the doubtful pleasure of attempting to delegate its constitutional functions to foreigners.

If the league goes through, England will control six votes as against the one vote of the United States.

In view of the way in which the English Government is treating the men and women of Ireland, are you willing to let that Government call your boys to war?

True, the case of Ireland is only an instance. But then Ireland is fighting now for just what the Thirteen Colonies fought in 1776.

Even if Ireland does not interest you, surely your own boys do. Drop a line to your Senator. Help send the league of nations back to Paris.

Published from the Irish Victory Fund under the auspices of Friends of Irish Freedom and Associated Societies.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. In a moment. If the facts were known as to the amount of money that it is believed the British Government is spending in this country to further the league of nations propaganda—and I am of the opinion that the English Government is the only Government that has ratified the treaty and the proposed league up to the present moment—it might call for a different kind of speech from the gentleman, and he might not be so bold in asserting that German money was being used here to defeat the league. [Applause.] Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. What I meant to say in connection with the publication of these articles in the press was not that those who were sore because Ireland was not free were advertising themselves. I meant that the Germans and the munition makers were against the league of nations.

Mr. GALLAGHER. If the gentleman were as good an Irishman as he states, he would not lead anybody to believe that the money to pay for the advertisement came from any such source. There is no proof for any such statement. Ireland has a right to expect assistance from the free people of America. Her sons died by thousands to make America free. In the late war over 2,000,000 American soldiers crossed 3,000 miles of sea to fight for the liberty and self-determination of small nations; over 600,000 of these were of Irish blood. Ireland assisted America with all her resources during the Revolution, and Washington's adopted son, Custis, at a public meeting to assist Ireland, held in Washington in 1829, said, "Ireland, my country's friend in my country's greatest need," and now they ask in return that which they have a right to expect, a recognition of the Irish Republic, and England has no right to object.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I did not get up here to discuss the league of nations. I do not have to vote on it. It may be my duty as a Member of the House, however, to vote to send some of our men over to police the Balkans. If we have to do that, I shall do it, but I declare I will do it with regret. [Applause.]

I just rose here to tell you a little story, one anecdote, which I think will be interesting. A few weeks ago I went to New York City to greet three returning batteries of Colorado troops, Batteries A, B, and C, of the One hundred and forty-eighth Field Artillery, which distinguished our State by their most valiant and effective service in four great battles, and as I saw that magnificent transport coming into the harbor, loaded down with our eager soldiers looking over the rail and waving from the portholes to their friends and relatives, there passed out of the harbor a similar vessel loaded with men going over to occupy the part of Germany which our soldiers will have to occupy for many years under the proposed peace treaty.

I have a brother recently returned from Germany. This young man came at his own expense from Alaska, where he was holding an excellent position in Government work, at the age of 38 years, to enlist as a private for war service in our Regular Army. He told me of a recruiting poster which was used at Coblenz to get men now in the service in Germany to reenlist. That poster said in substance this: "Reenlist. The Government offers you $60 bonus and 5 cents travel pay from the point of your residence and 30 days' leave in Paris. The United States goes dry July 1." [Laughter.]

That was the inducement for a soldier to reenlist. I suppose it was an inducement to some; I do not believe it was to very many, but I could not help wondering, when my brother told me this story, how this argument for the retention of our troops in Germany would appeal to the mothers of Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska, to whom such eloquent appeals have recently been made for a plan which will keep American soldiers for many years in Germany and probably in other parts of the world. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EDMONDS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following:

Ordered, That the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] be appointed on the part of the Senate a member of the commission to investigate the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service authorized in section 3 of the Post Office appropriation act approved March 1, 1919, vice Senator MCLEAN, resigned.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives thereof.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTING AND BINDING.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KIESS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the gentleman from Georgia, my esteemed friend, Mr. LANKFORD, in the time granted him under the pending bill, zealously and earnestly assailed the provisions of House bill 4870, introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], designed to preserve our young American potash industry against the illegitimate competition of the German potash monopoly.

I shall just now merely say, that I take unqualified issue with him fundamentally, for as I understand him, he is opposed to fostering in any degree, an infant American industry, if the least sacrifice would be thereby temporarily experienced by a consumer of the product in question, and this, regardless of the great ultimate public compensation and benefit to be derived in a year or two by affording such aid.

For my part, I am a firm believer in the wisdom of the policy of preserving American industries and American labor against the products of foreign countries, produced by low-priced labor, and the cost of the production of potash in the United States is nearly 99 per cent traceable to the cost of labor, direct and indirect.

Mr. Chairman, with this brief statement, I shall not give further direct notice to the discussion of the gentleman from Georgia, but allow the views that I shall express generally in behalf of the preservation of our domestic potash industry to suffice.

Neither shall I presume upon the very deservedly distinguished champion of American industries and American labor, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] by responding to the criticisms of the gentleman from Georgia of his legislative policies. The gentleman from Michigan will himself take care of this, should he consider the occasion to call for a response.

Mr. Chairman, I should not have promptly asked for time to be heard in behalf of the potash industry this morning, except for the spur given me to do so by the interposition of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], who, on account of his ability and character, commands the respect and confidence of the membership of this House in a very high degree. It is this that has impelled me to undertake immediately to disabuse the minds of the gentleman from North Carolina and of those who heard his charge made against the quality of American potash, of any prejudice thereby created against it.

I quote as follows:

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. POU. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is not pertinent anyway, because the potash discovered in this country, as I am informed, is no good, and they are proceeding to protect a commodity which is in no way comparable with the Alsace potash, and it is not a comparative case at all, because I know of crops that have been ruined by the use of this American potash.

SINGLE INSTANCE OF POOR QUALITY.

This charge constitutes a strong indictment against the quality of American potash, coming, as it does, from the gentleman from North Carolina, and it is emphasized by the circumstance that fertilizers are so generally used by farmers in that State.

But let me here frankly state that I freely grant that the gentleman from North Carolina has acted in perfect good faith, and I further grant that certain circumstances which arose last year, and the unjust reports which immediately followed, did lead many fertilizer users, in a section comprising parts of North Carolina and South Carolina, to believe for a time that our domestic potash was of a poor quality; but I shall readily show that the quality of our American potash in general was, by investigation and analyses, forthwith triumphantly vindicated.

Mr. Chairman, of the potash products of 150 or more of the American plants it was shown that the quality was of a good or high grade, at least equal to that imported from Germany and Alsace, with the single exception that the product from one Searles Lake plant, some consignments of which had been distributed in the Carolinas, was ascertained to include borax to an extent to cause injury to food plants and cotton. However, this particular Searles Lake plant, "The Trona," has discovered and applied a process whereby to eradicate the borax contained in its product sufficiently to render its use not injurious but beneficial to growing crops. This company now gives written guaranties that the borax is eradicated to the extent to render its product unobjectionable. No complaint has ever been made of the quality of any of the Nebraska product, but it has received the universal approval of its patrons.

HIGH QUALITY OF DOMESTIC PRODUCT.

Mr. Chairman, I shall conclusively prove that our American potash product is of a good quality and equal in quality to any hitherto imported from foreign countries. I shall here adduce evidence of a class the very best attainable. It consists of a statement made by J. C. Pridmore, the eminent agronomist of the Southern Fertilizer Association, of his own ascertainments of the quality of our domestic potash, followed by strong testimonials of the State chemists of North Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Georgia, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Louisiana, based on the analyses, also on observations they have made of the result of the use of domestic potash.

But before doing so permit me to call attention to what immediately followed the charge made against potash by the gentleman from North Carolina:

Mr. DENISON. Of course, if the potash produced in this country can not be used, there should be no protection given to it.
Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.
Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, will some one kindly rise up and tell me who is to pay the farmer for the loss in his farming operations occasioned by the lack of help caused by his sons being away in the service of their country. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 13, p. 4104.)

ABSENCE OF COMPLAINT OF USE OF DOMESTIC PRODUCT.

It is noteworthy to observe that the gentleman from Georgia, aggressive as he was against the Fordney bill, neither responded to the gentleman from North Carolina that he had before heard of that same charge being made against the quality of our American potash, nor did he assent to or comment upon it in any way whatever, from which it is justly inferable that the question of the quality was new to him. Certainly this is a very significant circumstance, remembering that the gentleman from Georgia represents one of the greatest cotton-producing localities in the United States. The fair conclusion is that the quality of the domestic product has been very satisfactory to the farmers in Georgia, and I shall show that such is the fact.

RECENT SALE OF NEBRASKA POTASH.

But let me cite a concrete and very convincing testimonial of the good quality of our domestic potash before calling distinctly expert witnesses. It is this: The Nebraska potash producers recently sold to the great fertilizer companies who supply the Carolinas and all the other cotton States with about all the fertilizers they use, a job lot of potash at a purchase price of between one and two million dollars. Would these experienced fertilizer dealers have purchased this Nebraska product with any question existing as to whether its quality came up to the standard? It is conclusive they would not have done so, thus to defraud and stupidly forfeit their patrons.

Mr. Chairman, referring further, briefly, to the very earnest opposition expressed by the gentleman from Georgia to the safeguarding of our domestic potash industry, I want to make a suggestion which I think will bring the proposition nearer home to him, and thus appeal more favorably to his judgment, maybe to his sympathy.

There are the greensands in his home State, which are constantly being mentioned with the potash resources of the United States, and I understand that the same are right promising. Suppose these greensand deposits should become developed into a large potash industry, thus furnishing a handmaiden for cotton growing in Georgia. Assuredly this would create a community of interests right there locally between cotton growers and potash producers, and all the employees of both. The diversification of industry would add greatly to the general prosperity of the locality and the State.

Under such circumstances, would the gentleman from Georgia or his constituents, whether cotton growers or not, prefer patronizing the German monopoly rather than the Georgia plants?

Mr. Chairman, just such developments as I have here suggested are likely to occur in over half of the States of the Union if the industry is permitted to live. This is not an "out West," "up North," "down South," Atlantic coast, or Pacific coast proposition, nor is it a Nebraska, Utah, or California proposition. It is essentially national, and the war made it an international proposition. As an American I should be for the conservation of the industry if there were no potash plants or resources in Nebraska. For years I have been in favor of pursuing that national policy which might, in my judgment, best promote the development of our national resources and industries to an extent to make our country self-sustaining and independent, when need be, of foreign nations. I shall print herewith testimonials I have mentioned. [Applause.]

TESTIMONIALS OF THE GOOD QUALITY OF AMERICAN POTASH.

An excerpt taken from Mr. Pridmore's lengthy statement is as follows:

Since the potash now used in commercial fertilizers of this country is American made some farmers have shown a disposition to wonder if it is as good as the potash that formerly came from Germany. The State chemists of the South are all of one accord in declaring that the plants made use of potash irrespective of its source, and that American made potash is as good as any other.

Testimonial of Mr. B. B. Rose, State chemist of Alabama: "Considerable amounts of potash have been produced in the last year or two from deposits found in Nebraska and from kelp. Some is being supplied through the medium of cottonseed meal. All the above-mentioned forms of potash should give as good results when applied to crops that are in need of this constituent, and I see no reason for any apprehension as to the quality of potash being supplied at the present time.

Testimonial of Mr. J. B. Rather, State chemist of Arkansas: "Americans can make and are making just as good potash as ever left a German seaport. A fertilizer analyzing 2 per cent potash by the official methods is just as good as regards potash as any fertilizer ever manufactured. Anyone who persists in believing that the only satisfactory potash bears the label 'Made in Germany,' is playing directly into the hands of the German Potash Trust."

Testimonial of Mr. W. F. Hand, State chemist of Mississippi: Fertilizers are manufactured and sold under a definite guaranty as heretofore. Materials entering into their composition are just as good as they have ever been in the history of the fertilizer industry. Of course, the general conditions make prices high, but there has certainly been no deterioration in quality. There is absolutely no ground for the statement that the soluble potash in American salts is not equivalent, pound for pound, to that in salts heretofore imported. Farmers need feel no hesitancy whatever in the purchase of their fertilizers this year. They are as good as they have ever been."

Testimonial of Mr. W. C. Dumas, State chemist of Georgia: "Potash is potash, no matter whether it originated in Germany or in this country. Our domestic sulphate of potash or muriate of potash is just as effective as a plant food as any other. It is absurd for anyone to state that the fertilizer made with domestic potash as a source of this element is not as effective as a similar goods of the same analysis made with German salts as the source of potash, and it is erroneous for anyone to believe or state that the locality from which the material was obtained has anything to do with the value or availability of the potash in the guano."

Testimonial of Mr. R. M. Brackett, State chemist of South Carolina: "Our fertilizer laws require the guaranty of water-soluble potash only. Every per cent of water-soluble potash in American potash is worth, dollar for dollar, to the farmer just as much as the water-soluble potash from Germany. The farmer may rest assured that 6 or 12 or 48 per cent of water-soluble potash furnished by American sources is of exactly the same value to him as 6 or 12 or 48 per cent of water-soluble potash furnished by German sources or by sources from any other country."

Testimonial of J. W. Sample, State chemist of Tennessee: "One lot of muriate of potash of a certain analysis is just as effective as other muriate of potash of the same analysis, whether imported from Germany or produced in this country. The same is true of sulphate and carbonate of potash. It is true that the potash salts produced in this country are not so rich in potash as some of the salts which we formerly got from Germany, but the fertilizer manufacturers take this into account when making up their formulas and simply use more of the domestic salts than they formerly used of the German salts, and in this way produce a finished product of the same analysis and value to the farmer."

Testimonial of W. R. Dodson, director experiment station, Louisiana: "To those who really need potash, I wish to say that I have never had any indication from the three experiment stations where sources of potash have been under investigation that sulphate or muriate of potash manufactured in this country are inferior in any way to imported products, except as applied to tobacco. The form in which potash is applied does have some influence on the quality of tobacco, but for all other crops there is no reliable evidence known to me that the previously imported products have any superiority whatever to our homemade goods."

Mr. KIESS. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the Members of the House and of the country to what I consider a very serious abuse of the franking privilege. I do it now because this bill before the House deals with that question, and I hope will in the future prevent a practice that has been indulged in in the past. On the 21st of last February there appeared before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce a gentleman by the name of Hon. Albert M. Todd, who is president of the Public Ownership League of America, and he delivered a prepared statement before that committee presenting what he considered to be all of the final arguments in favor of Government ownership.

My understanding is that he was a voluntary witness, and he went before the committee and presented a long brief in favor of the doctrine of Government ownership of all public utilities and other industries that are of a public nature. He presented that argument to the Senate committee, and then afterwards had his own testimony and the brief that he filed before the committee printed in pamphlet form, of which I have a copy, entitled "Public Ownership of Railroads," which consists of 44 pages of fine print. That statement was sent out by the Public Ownership League to various people over the country. It seems that there is a league organized, known as the Public Ownership League of America, and they have offices in Washington in the Evening Star Building, on Pennsylvania Avenue and Eleventh Street. This statement before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate was made under authority of that league by its president, Albert M. Todd, who, as I understand, was formerly a Member of this House. The statement and brief was sent out under the frank of a Member of another legislative body. I am not going to transgress any of the rules of the House if I can help it, and therefore I can only speak briefly, but I am informed that at least 20,000 copies of this argument have been sent out, and there may have been three or four times that many. We are not permitted under the rules, as I understand them, to refer by name to Members of the Senate or discuss their actions on the floor of the House. Therefore I am confined within very narrow limits in calling attention to what I think has been a gross abuse of the franking privilege, if not of the law, in sending out free of postage these printed documents.

If they were sent out under the frank of a Member of Congress without the Member's knowledge or consent, then the man who sent them is guilty of the same offense that anyone else is who takes something to which he is not entitled. If they were sent out with the Member's consent, then there was a violation of the law, clear and plain. The law provides that—

It shall be unlawful for any person entitled under the law to the use of a frank to lend such frank or permit its use by any committee, organization, or association, or permit its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization, or association: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to any committee composed of Members of Congress.

So that a Member has no right under the present law to permit any organization or association not composed of the Members of Congress to use his frank to send out documents of this kind. There has been a plain abuse of the law in my judgment in this instance, and an imposition upon the people of the country in distributing broadcast over the country great volumes of these pamphlets under the frank of a Member of one of the legislative bodies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to say that the hope is that this bill has provisions in it to cure such misuse, if you desire to so call it, of the franking privilege. And further to prove the necessity for a bill of this kind, it is a matter of record that an agricultural document, printed at the Government Printing Office, was taken by a hardware firm, an agricultural implement concern, opened up and pages of advertisements put in and the whole thing made to appear as a Government publication, and sent around as if the Government was indorsing that hardware proposition. The bill also tries to protect the use of the words "Printed at the Government Printing Office."

Mr. RANDALL of California. This is a violation of the present law, is it not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; and I want this bill made so strict and tight that before documents of this kind can be published by even a Member, some committee must pass upon it and say whether it is frankable, so that this unwarranted abuse may be stopped. The gentleman, or the league who sent this pamphlet out, addressed a letter to the persons to whom they were franked.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I will ask the gentleman to yield me two minutes more.

Mr. KIESS. I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. He mailed out to each person to whom this pamphlet was franked a letter, which I understand was not franked, but was sent under paid postage, and in that letter he says:

In a separate envelope franked by ——— ——— I send you a pamphlet of 44 pages containing highly valuable and authentic data from official sources, which I submitted in the recent railroad hearings of Congress in behalf of the Public Ownership League of America.

Showing clearly that he sent the documents himself, and of course he paid the bills for them. There was a violation of law. If we have some kind of arrangement by which these matters have to be submitted to a committee before they can be printed and sent out in that way it will stop this abuse. That pamphlet was sent out at Government expense, perhaps all over the United States.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BAER. The departments themselves are abusing this privilege and are sending out propaganda for everything, and newspapers get a truck load of this every month, which is thrown into the wastebasket.

Mr. DENISON. That is true. In the same letter just referred to this gentleman says:

Your attention is earnestly invited to the Public Ownership League of America, whose purposes are briefly stated above, etc.

In other words, this is pure propaganda in favor of Government ownership. I would be just as much opposed to it if it were propaganda against Government ownership, so far as violating the law is concerned in sending through the mail, and at Government expense, such pamphlets as this. I do not think any committee, whether for or against any of these propositions, ought to be allowed the privilege of sending out a great volume of stuff like this at Government expense; and I do not think any of the Members of Congress ought to permit the use of their franking privilege in this manner and thereby impose upon the people of the country the expense of carrying free such stuff all over the country. Men sometimes go before these committees of the Senate and the House and testify and file great long briefs for the very purpose of having the privilege of franking their statements out at Government expense, and not for the purpose of enlightening the committee upon anything. That sort of thing ought to be stopped. Of course, there is no way that we can prevent any man from going before a committee and asking to be heard. Every man has a right to go before Congress and be heard on any important matter, if the committee can arrange to hear him. What I am objecting to is this loose custom of allowing anyone to go before the committees, make a long speech, and file a long brief and then to use the franks of Members to send them out broadcast over the country as a pamphlet at Government expense. I hope this bill will prevent that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Have not the committees control over this? A witness before a committee will very often put in a whole lot of extraneous matter which he wants to circulate, and has not the committee the right to refuse to print that stuff so as to prevent its being given the franking privilege?

Mr. DENISON. I am not able to answer that question. I hope they have.

Mr. FESS. They ought to have.

Mr. POU. They undoubtedly have that right.

Mr. DENISON. I hope they have. But how can a committee say what is not proper and what is proper? I know that that is a very difficult thing to say.

Mr. POU. That is very true. It is an embarrassing situation.

Mr. DENISON. The way you can control it is to require that this stuff, before it can be franked, be passed upon by some committee.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. What will be the law with relation to this fact: A Member desires to print something legitimate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, perhaps a speech. Can he have that printed by an outside printer, provided it has his own material in it?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does that cut it out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He can print and frank in any way he pleases anything properly frankable from the House of Representatives, of course.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Not by the Public Printer, necessarily.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Members should remember this, that if a man wants to send out speeches which he pays for, the public does not know as a rule he pays for them. Heretofore the Government has contributed the manila envelopes. When this bill passes, if he pays for his speech he pays for the envelopes, which is a fair proposition.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. He can print outside?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Under this law it can be printed outside?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL of California. What is to prevent their being printed outside and using the mail privilege?

Mr. DENISON. I want this bill to prevent the use of the franking privilege by those who have no right to it, and if it does not do it it ought to be amended by the committee, so as to prevent it beyond any doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public proceedings of each House of Congress, as reported by the Official Reporters thereof, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which shall be issued in daily form during each session and bound in permanent form promptly at the close of each session. The daily and permanent RECORD shall bear the same date, which shall be that of the actual day's proceedings reported therein. The binding of the permanent RECORD shall be in half russia only.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] a few minutes ago, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to call the attention of the Members of the House to the legislation now pending before the Ways and Means Committee relative to the protection of the American potash industry.

Before the war practically all of the potash used by the United States was imported from Germany. Agents of the Central Powers were furthering their hold on this industry by every means at their command. As it now develops, they were even looking forward to "der tag" when the United States would be rendered helpless, in their judgment, by the withdrawal of the potash supply during the gigantic struggle we have just passed through. "The day" came, and in the potash dilemma, as well as every other condition of our country's "unpreparedness," the great American people patriotically arose to the occasion.

When the foreign supply of potash was cut off and word went out from the Government that a potash supply was an imperative need, thousands of liberty-loving, patriotic citizens in California, Utah, Colorado, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming put their money into the development of the potash industry without stopping to ask any questions as to profit. Our country was at war with an insidious foe; we had to have potash, and that was enough for an American to ask. At least $50,000,000 were invested in the production of potash. Owing to the great expense of getting started, coupled with the short time in which sales were made, because of the early armistice, the men who put their honest hard-earned money into this necessary industry realized not a dollar of profit; in fact, most of them lost money. But they met the potash shortage in the emergency, and, in this particular, rendered an invaluable service.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I shall not yield; I have but five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but we are considering the bill under the five-minute rule, and it is a very important piece of legislation. I think it really ought to pass the House of Representatives. I did not undertake to make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing his amendment; I do not care to do that; but when the gentleman says he has only five minutes he has that five minutes by the grace of the committee and not by his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. GARNER. I do not care to interrupt, but I merely call to his attention the fact that he declined to yield. The gentleman made a statement, if he will permit, on which I would like to have information. I am a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. We have been having hearings. But a moment ago the gentleman spoke of $50,000,000 being invested in the potash industry. I believe the information before the committee was that about all the investment involved was about $11,000,000. If the gentleman has facts relative to the investment of $50,000,000 and he will put them in the RECORD it will be very enlightening to the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the gentleman's statement that only $11,000,000 has been invested in the potash industry throughout the United States, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in Nebraska alone there are 9 plants each having an investment ranging from $500,000 to $1,500,000, and about 20 smaller plants with investments ranging from $30,000 to $100,000 each. It is safe to say that at least $10,000,000 has been invested in the potash industry in Nebraska alone, to say nothing of the investments in the Nation as a whole. Col. Parker testified before the Ways and Means Committee that approximately $50,000,000 had been invested in the potash industry. I have found nothing in the hearings to discredit Col. Parker's estimate of the amount invested. From my own study of this industry I am convinced that the amount invested is over rather than under $50,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the only question we were endeavoring to solve by this pending license system were that of protecting those of our citizens who have invested their money under the conditions and circumstances I have set forth, I believe that this legislative action would be thoroughly justified. But the fact that these worthy citizens will lose $50,000,000 unless they are protected for a short time in this unforeseen emergency is the least argument in favor of this measure. I for one would feel justified in supporting the measure from the standpoint of this one argument alone, but a study of the potash situation that has been developed during the war reveals to us conclusive arguments of a weighty and nation-wide character in favor of the temporary protection of the potash industry.

While only 54,000 tons of actual potash—one-fourth of our average annual consumption—was produced in the United States last year, owing to the great volume of preparatory work necessary in the way of installing machinery and discovering processes looking toward production, the most significant fact in this whole matter is that potash supplies have been discovered sufficient to take care of the needs of the United States for centuries to come. The equipment that has already been installed will insure an annual output of 100,000 tons of potash. The new equipment that will be installed very shortly, if we protect this industry, will insure an annual output equal to our every demand; and the perfecting processes that are developing and the further discoveries that will be made give us every reason to hope that within a few years unlimited supplies of potash can be produced right here in the United States under conditions that will enable us to compete in price with any other nation in the world. The average cost to the farmers in affording this temporary protection while the potash industry is undergoing necessary development will not exceed 20 cents an acre for the land fertilized, and the average price that will be paid will not exceed $2 a unit, whereas $6 a unit was paid during the war without complaint. If men are patriotic enough to pay $6 a unit for potash without complaint during the war, does anyone assume to say that they will be unwilling to pay $2 a unit for a period of a few years in order to render the United States independent of every other country in the world as to its potash supply for all time to come, either in peace or war? In this connection I wish to read a letter of a Maryland farmer written to Col. Myron M. Parker under date of June 27, 1919, which I believe expresses the true sentiment of every fair-minded farmer of the Nation:

Col. MYRON M. PARKER, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLONEL: The National Grange came closer to the farmer than any other organization of farmers. It is composed of real farmers and its organization is extensive. I am a member of the grange at Alvey, Md.

For 18 years I was Chief of the United States Weather Bureau and also an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and for 13 years I have owned and personally operated a large fruit, grain, and stock farm at Rockville, Md. My interests are therefore wholly with the betterment of the agricultural conditions of the Nation.

One of the things that seems to me to be imperative is that the beginning that the United States has made as a necessity of war in the manufacture of potash should continue until this country becomes independent of Germany or any other nation in the supplying of this absolutely necessary fertilizer. Every far-seeing farmer will willingly pay whatever price is necessary to protect this new American industry, to the end that we may become independent of other countries and ultimately get the American product cheaper than it can be shipped to us from abroad. No doubt the Germans will sell to us as soon as trade relations are resumed at less than the cost to the manufacturer in this country; but, as a farmer, I know that as soon as the American manufacturer is driven out of business and his plants destroyed the price of the foreign potash will go to an altitude beyond that which is now necessary to protect the American producers of this farm necessity. The price of food is not only high, but it will stay high for years to come, and I know that I and other farmers can use potash at the present price at a profit to ourselves and the home industry of manufacturing potash be developed to the time when a healthy American competition will give us this commodity as cheap as it can be produced and shipped to us from over the sea.

Above all, we should not adopt any shortsighted policy that will ever again put this country at the mercy of a foreign country for our supply of this plant food, especially if that country is now an enemy or is ever likely to become one.

Very respectfully, WILLIS L. MOORE.

Referring again to the supply of potash in this country, the reports of the United States Geological Survey, which are substantiated by many university chemists from different States, warrant us in believing that the supply is to all intents and purposes inexhaustible. Searles Lake alone has 12 square miles of potash deposits, or enough to supply the United States on its present basis of consumption for 80 years. The supply in Nebraska lakes is not yet fully known, but it is believed to be even greater than that of Searles Lake. Rich potash deposits have been found to a depth of 37 feet in the mud under these lakes, and the pumping systems that are being perfected will insure the utilization of all of this potash to any depth it may be discovered. The Leucite rock potash deposits in Wyoming are estimated as being sufficient to supply the United States for 800 years, and the reduction plants that are now installed for the preparation of Leucite potash are proven to be of practical construction for their designed purpose. It is exceedingly probable that the manufacture of potash as a by-product in sugar factories, cement and brick plants, and hot-blast furnaces will so develop in the years to come as to take care of the entire potash demand of the country.

In thus developing our own potash industries by using our own supplies, we are also making use of American labor in its production, instead of allowing our recent enemy to dump in on the country vast supplies of potash mined in Germany by prison labor during the very time in which we were engaged in the war.

In Nebraska alone two towns, Hofland and Antioch, aggregating a population of 3,000 people, have been born by the potash industry. The town of Lake Side has grown from a mere elevator station to a village of 1,000 people. One thousand five hundred people are employed in potash development in this State alone, and as the industry grows throughout the Nation multiplied thousands of laborers will be profitably employed in producing this great national necessity.

Mr. Chairman, it hardly seems to me that it is necessary to multiply words in further arguing this question. It is enough for us to know that by providing temporary protection for the potash industry we are saving to patriotic investors $50,000,000, making possible the speedy development of a potash supply that will take care of the needs of our country for all future time, and that we are thus rendering ourselves independent of any other country that would seek to handicap us by controlling a great industry necessary to our food production, either in time of peace or in war. I hope the Members of this Congress will not be so nearsighted as to fail to see the justice of this provision and the tremendous future of the potash industry of America that hinges entirely on the result of our attitude toward this pending legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. PAR. 3. The Joint Committee on Printing shall have control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and, while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of the proceedings of Congress, shall take all needed action for the reduction of unnecessary bulk, and shall provide for the publication of an index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semimonthly during the sessions of Congress and promptly at the close thereof, and for a table of contents in each issue of the daily RECORD whenever practicable: Provided, That no illustrations shall be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, except such maps, charts, or diagrams, in black and white and not exceeding a page of the RECORD in size each, as shall be authorized by the Joint Committee on Printing: Provided further, That the Joint Committee on Printing shall designate to the Public Printer a competent person or persons to prepare the semimonthly and session indexes and the daily table of contents of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to edit the bound edition thereof, and shall fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for the said work and charged to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I take this occasion to refer to a matter that appears on page 3580 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, August 2, 1919. Mr. BLANTON made the following statement on that occasion:

We are told that unless we raise the wages of the railroad employees another billion dollars annually that there is to be a strike on September 1 from one side of this Nation to the other. And by reason of such threats, ipso facto, Congress must provide the increase. By such threats the four great brotherhoods forced the Adamson law upon Congress and upon the Nation. By such threats the four great brotherhoods during the war forced Director General McAdoo to give them an annual increase of wages of $754,811,000.

I want to clear up the situation a little on that proposition, and in order to do so I want to read some testimony given by Mr. Garretson, president of the Order of Railroad Conductors, testifying before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on August 11, last Monday, where he made the following statements:

Mr. GARRETSON. * * *

But the point that I want to make is that the four brotherhoods, in being forced on to Congress regarding the passage of the eight-hour act, were unwilling participants. Only the influence, the power, and the personal prestige of the President of the United States ever got us there. We came there on his demand that we should come there for adjudication of the question that we desired to settle by our own methods. But, out of regard for the interest that the President had shown, and respect for the position which he held, and our respect for the office of Chief Magistrate, we accepted his request to transfer the matter in controversy to the Halls of Congress. No living Senator or Representative ever heard a demand from one representative of the four brotherhoods as to what they should do.

Now, before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, the day before the Adamson bill was passed, a request was made on the four brotherhoods to know whether or not they would defer the hour of the strike. The request had been made by the President of the United States two days prior to that time. The three associates of mine stated to the committee in open hearing that they did not possess power to do the thing requested, but that I would answer for the four. I answered that I had the power, but that I refused to defer. I told them why, and after I told them no further request was made for deferring nor were there any methods of coercion used on any Member, and there is no Member of the present Congress who was a Member of that Congress who will challenge that statement. There are many men here who were Members of that Congress and present at that time. I challenge any one of them to question the correctness of the statement I have made. I wanted just this chance, Mr. Chairman, to make that a matter of record with regard to the talk about holding a stop watch on Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. I was not present in Washington when that was passed. My recollection is that there were no hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the Adamson bill.

Mr. GARRETSON. There were no hearings. My communications with that committee were all through the floor leader. Mr. Wills made the point that there was a joint hearing, but if so, I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Wills is mistaken about that. I was on the committee at that time. Perhaps Mr. Wills came to that conclusion because a good many members of that committee went over there; but I did not sit with the Senate committee.

Mr. GARRETSON. There were a number of Members of the House present during the entire hearing, but if there was a member of this committee that sat with the Senate committee I was not aware of the fact. I never appeared directly before the House committee. I did meet the chairman once or twice, and I conferred a half a dozen times, possibly, with Mr. KITCHIN, who was the floor leader at that time, was he not, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. May I say that during the debate on the Adamson bill on the floor of the House I made almost the same identical statement that you made here a minute ago, and I have resented at all times the saying that the railroad brothers had come to Congress with a gun in one hand and a stop-watch in the other.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CARSS. I will yield.

Mr. COOPER. I trust the gentleman will pardon me for putting to him a personal question. Is the gentleman a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotitve Engineers?

Mr. CARSS. Yes, sir; I am.

Mr. COOPER. If I have been correctly informed, the gentleman has been chairman of the general committee that had charge of the wage question.

Mr. CARSS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. COOPER. I beg to ask the gentleman this question: To what extent have the wages of railroad employees—that is, engineers, firemen, trainmen, and conductors—been increased in the last two years according to the increase that has been received by other skilled employees of this Nation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARSS. In answer to the question of the gentleman I will say that the wages of train and engine men of this country have not increased in as great a proportion by, I should say, 40 per cent as has been the increase of other laborers.

Mr. COOPER. Now, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for just one moment there?

Mr. CARSS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], I believe, on yesterday made the statement that these railroad employees were asking for wages equal to those of the Supreme Court judges and Members of Congress of the United States. I was informed by Mr. Garretson on yesterday that the average wage that the freight conductors of our country received for 100 miles, which constitutes a day's work, is $5.40. I should like to call to the attention of the gentleman from Texas that his wages are over $20 a day, and there is a vast difference between $5.40 and $20 a day. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to know what the wages of engineers are. Will the gentleman give that information?

Mr. CARSS. That is a pretty hard question to answer offhand. The wages of engineers vary. A switch engineer receives lower wages than an engineer who runs an engine like a Mallet compound.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. About what?

Mr. CARSS. The wages of the average switch engineer, I should say, are about $5.25 for 10 hours or less.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And what are the wages for those on passenger engines?

Mr. CARSS. The men on passenger engines are on a mileage basis and receive so much per mile, and the amount that they receive, of course, is determined by the number of miles they run and how rapidly they make those miles.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What would be the average wage of a passenger engineer?

Mr. CARSS. Monthly?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. I should think, taking all the runs, short and long and good and bad and indifferent, it would be in the region of $200.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARSS. I will.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. What percentage of engineers are passenger engineers?

Mr. CARSS. I should say about 15 per cent. About 16 men out of every 100 who have commenced with firing engines eventually become passenger engineers.

I will read:

Mr. SIMS. I was a member of the committee at that time and the ranking member, next to Mr. Adamson, and no labor man ever asked me a question, or anybody else, but I considered the measure on its own value, strike or no strike, and I have no apologies to make, as a member of that committe, for having exercised my right of voting without fear or favor. My information and knowledge lead me to believe it was right and my conscience told me to do right if the heavens fell, and I went ahead and did it.

Now, there is another matter I would like to refer to briefly in connection with the introduction of this Sims bill.

The events of the past week have given rise to a great confusion as to the purposes of the Railway Brotherhoods and the leaders of the American Federation of Labor. It is only natural that there should have been confusion, for quite suddenly the Nation was confronted with spontaneous strikes in the railroad shops, with wage demands of several of the railroad unions, and with the introduction of the bill embracing the so-called Plumb plan for nationalization of the railroads under tripartite control.

In the statements of union leaders as to the wage demands and as to the commission proposed by the Director General to the President and concurred in by him a great deal was said. The leaders of labor did not feel inclined to accept this commission because the need of the workers for what they considered to be American wage was acute and a commission meant delay in a matter which called for very prompt action. The depreciation of money had left the railroad employees in precisely the same place they had occupied before their wages were advanced by the Railroad Administration.

But while the determination of the labor leaders was plainly not to accede to a delay in the question of wages, there never has been a vestige of a threat of strike or the desire of intimidation in regard to the Sims bill, now before the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

I can say of my own personal knowledge that in all the conferences of the railroad union presidents held during the spring and this summer in connection with their advocacy of the Plumb plan the subject of strike as a means to support the plan has never been even broached. These union leaders felt it incumbent upon them, as responsible guides in the American labor movement, to act without provocation and with all the dignity that should inhere to American political life. They did map out a program. They did organize a league. They did make arrangements to take to the rank and file of their membership and to the public as a whole all of the arguments and information relating to the Plumb plan that could be effectively distributed. I suggest that no one will disagree with me that this was anything less than praiseworthy.

Mr. Plumb, testifying before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, has explained how the bill came to be introduced when it was. The program called for introduction not before October, and then as the spirit of resistance on the wage questions became apparent, the program was changed, and the labor bill was thrown into the basket to prove to the men in the shops and on the trains that their interests were being carefully served. So, as it happens, the threats of strike were not made in support of the Sims bill, but the Sims bill was introduced when it was as an effective answer to the strikes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five more minutes. He is a new Member, and I would like to hear him.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I will have to object.

Mr. UPSHAW. Let the gentleman have three minutes more.

Mr. POU. The gentleman was interrupted for four or five minutes by Members who were interrogating him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARSS. Now, I want to say that American labor is pursuing in the matter of this nationalization legislation a course which deserves something more intelligent than the hysteria to be noted in certain quarters. After all, there are over 5,000,000 union members in America, and they have a right to be heard in this Congress, and any measure upon which they unite after due consideration is surely worthy of debate on the floor of Congress. There have been no threats, either by word or by innuendo, as to what would happen if Congress did not see fit to discuss what 5,000,000 voters asked in a legitimate manner to have discussed.

A great deal has been made of one sentence in the opening statement of the brotherhood and union chiefs, in which certain newspapers that always show an extreme cordiality to the propositions of the financial interests pretended to see a threat as to what might happen if the Plumb plan were not adopted. This sentence is, with one other bearing on the same subject matter, the only one in any authorized pronouncement of the railroad union leaders which can be maliciously misconstrued. The sentence begins:

The railroad employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control—

And, gentlemen, there these newspapers invariably stop quoting. But the sentence continues—since all the plans suggested for this settlement of the problem leave labor essentially where it has stood and where it is determined not to stand.

No one reading this sentence thoughtfully can find in it the intimidation that has been so frequently referred to as having been employed to support a labor measure before Congress. It is a statement of fact; it is the assertion of chosen leaders as to the sentiment of their constituents. And the leaders took pains to repeat it in the last statement they issued, when they said:

We hold to our conviction that the railroad employees are in no mood to consign themselves finally to the autocratic control of financial dictators.

In other words, we are informed that labor must have a better life than was possible in the old state of things. But though labor proposes a constructive measure, it does not say, "You must adopt our measure." It says only you must do something constructive. The statement continued:

We appeal to the statesmanship of America and to the common sense of American manhood and womanhood.

And in this statement appears this truthful assertion:

We have no desire and have had none to impress by violence or by threat our proposal that the railroads be nationalized under "tripartite" control.

I have taken the trouble to inform myself, and I can say that in presenting the Plumb plan to this House the leaders of the American labor movement have shown a full trust in the democratic institutions of this country. And it remains with us of Congress to show whether we will give the proposal of 5,000,000 voters a full, thoughtful American hearing or only a scant and formal acknowledgment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARSS. Can I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that I protest against the language he used with reference to the railroad men of this country.

I protest in the name of thousands of loyal, industrious, patriotic American citizens. I protest in the name of their wives and children, whose husbands and fathers have been characterized as highwaymen on the floor of this House. I protest in the name of the hundreds of railroad men who freely gave their lives for the cause of democracy and who now sleep their last long sleep in the blood-soaked soil of France. [Applause.]

I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in the kindliest manner possible and with all due allowance for the natural fervency of his disposition that the great problem of social unrest which now confronts us can not be solved by the calling of hard names. It is a problem that challenges the best brains of the world to solve, and it must be approached from a different angle than that from which the gentleman seems to approach it. [Applause.]

I present to this Congress that the men and women who toil have the same joys and sorrows, the same ideals and aspirations, and the same rights under that flag [pointing] as have the men and women for whom they toil.

If we keep these facts in mind when attempting a solution of this great problem, I hope and trust this Congress will be able to formulate legislation that will be just to all the people of this great Republic and that we may hand down to our children a greater, a better, and a purer democracy than the one that we now enjoy.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated at different times that the majority part of this House was responsible for legislation. I do not hold with those that take that view. I believe that every man here is responsible, regardless of his political affiliations, and I want to say that I am ready, for one, to cooperate with any man or any group of men who are attempting in an honest way to pass legislation that will relieve the country of the conditions that are confronting it. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that this is Calendar Wednesday and that we have been very liberal in the matter of general debate. The committee is very anxious to pass this bill to-day, and I would ask, therefore, that Members confine their remarks to the bill. Unless they do so it will be impossible to complete the bill before adjournment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is within the control of the members of the committee to confine the debate to the bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. PAR. 3. Either House may by simple resolution order additional copies or reprints of any Government publication to the amount of $500; if the estimated cost exceeds that sum, or if it is proposed to make such publication available for distribution under section 20 of this act, the printing shall be ordered by concurrent resolution, unless the resolution is self-appropriating, when the order shall be by joint resolution. Such resolutions when presented to either House shall be referred immediately to its Committee on Printing, which shall report thereon as provided for in this section: Provided, That whenever additional copies or a reprint of any Government publication shall be ordered by Congress or either House, there shall also be printed sufficient copies to provide the usual number only for those not previously supplied therewith, and, if the number of copies be not stated in the order, there shall only be printed sufficient copies to provide the document room of each House with its usual number and to provide for those included in the usual number not previously supplied therewith: Provided further, That the Joint Committee on Printing may order additional copies or reprints of any Government publication at an estimated cost not to exceed $200 for any one publication in any one Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have not read this bill. I am following it hurriedly under the rapid reading of the Clerk, of which I quite approve. In section 3, paragraph 3, it says:

Either House may by simple resolution order additional copies or reprints of any Government publication to the amount of $500; if the estimated cost exceeds that sum, or if it is proposed to make such publication available for distribution under section 20 of this act—

And I am not familiar with section 20—

the printing shall be ordered by concurrent resolution unless the resolution is self-appropriating.

And then further it says:

Such resolutions when presented to either House shall be referred immediately to the Committee on Printing, which shall report thereon as provided for in this section.

Now, again:

Provided, That whenever additional copies or a reprint of any Government publication shall be ordered by Congress or either House there shall also be printed sufficient copies to provide the usual number only for those not previously supplied therewith, and if the number of copies be not stated in the order there shall only be printed sufficient copies to provide the document room of each House with its usual number and to provide for those included in the usual number not previously supplied therewith.

Now, I think that I can strike all this out. I do not care about duplicating it. It says:

Provided further, That the Joint Committee on Printing may order additional copies or reprints.

I thought it required a joint resolution somewhere in this section, passed by the House and the Senate and approved by the President. Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, it does not require a joint resolution except where there is an appropriation. The gentleman understands that. But for printing for the two Houses this paragraph does not change existing law.

Mr. CANNON. A joint resolution? When or under what conditions? Explain to me.

Mr. KIESS. Carrying an appropriation, a resolution would have to go to the Committee on Appropriations. No regular printing resolution carries an appropriation. The expense is paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Why would a joint resolution be necessary?

Mr. KIESS. It is not necessary. A concurrent resolution is necessary.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Why should there be a concurrent resolution? Why should not each body, the House and Senate, be at liberty to order additional copies of anything, whether it be estimates or whatever it may be, without having the other body assent?

Mr. KIESS. This applies particularly, Mr. Chairman, to orders of additional copies. The House, of course, can order printed anything that we want printed. We are limited, of course, by the amount that can be expended.

Mr. CANNON. Frequently there is a document, for example, the President's message or address—I merely refer to that—or some other important matter for the convenience of the House that would exceed the amount specified in the proposed legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that I may have a minute or two longer. I may want five; I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I am merely asking these questions for information. I will illustrate by taking as an example the President's addresses to the House. My recollection is that when he makes these addresses the House, one side or the other, frequently desires for distribution an increased number of copies. Does that take a concurrent resolution?

Mr. KIESS. No; that does not take a concurrent resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Take, for example, the recent message. I stated, I believe, on the floor here that we could order up to $500 worth. I investigated it and found that it was $200 worth. That applies to quite a number of ordinary 16-page pamphlets. I believe under the present law in excess of that sum you go to the Joint Committee on Printing, but without a resolution either House can incur an expenditure of $500. Beyond that we provide by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I should think it might be done. Have you not a printing organization of the Senate as well as the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; there is a Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses.

Mr. CANNON. I think it should be done by the Joint Committee on Printing instead of by concurrent resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The day has gone by when Congress will send out horse books by the hundreds of thousands, or any other Government publication, to be used as doorstoppers and props for barns, and things like that.

Mr. CANNON. It may be. If the gentleman had been here in the days of the horse book, representing an agricultural district as he does, I think he would have been "agonizing" for more copies than are here provided.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Since I have been here I have seen, just through one of these congressional accidents, 1,500 copies of the Alaska laws, Alaska being a Territory, and under the machinery that we had then we were forced to distribute about 8 or 10 copies to each Member, so that the Member from Florida had his quota of the compiled laws of Alaska.

Mr. CANNON. You have cured that elsewhere in the bill—in section 20, probably. I suppose it is sufficiently well guarded by the provision that a Member of Congress may have an equivalent of what is provided by law of all these documents?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Precisely.

Mr. CANNON. Or exchange, and have the amount in documents that he desires for distribution?

Mr. KIESS. Yes. That comes later. If I may answer the gentleman from Illinois, I would say that this particular part that he refers to is the existing law. There is no change from the existing law, and in addition to this the Joint Committee on Printing has authority to order printing to the amount of $200 if there is a shortage.

Mr. YATES. How many copies of the President's message will $500 provide?

Mr. KIESS. About 40,000 copies.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Whenever any matter shall be ordered printed as a document or a report by either House, the order therefor shall include the number of copies, unless otherwise provided for, necessary to meet the following distribution:

Of the Senate numbered documents and reports, excepting reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions, there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 300 copies; to the House document room, not to exceed 500 copies; to the Secretary of the Senate and to the Clerk of the House, not to exceed 10 copies each.

Of the House numbered documents and reports, excepting reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions, there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 200 copies; to the House document room, not to exceed 500 copies; to the Secretary of the Senate, not to exceed 10 copies; and to the Clerk of the House, not to exceed 20 copies: Provided, That upon the order of any Senator or Member at the beginning of each session, one copy of every document of such session shall be delivered promptly to his office by the Senate or the House document room, respectively, from the number provided therefor in this section.

Of the Senate and the House numbered documents and reports, excepting reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions, there shall also be distributed, unbound, as follows: To the Executive Office, 2 copies; to the Library of Congress, 3 copies; to the Department of State, for the use of the Diplomatic and Consular Service, 20 copies; to each foreign embassy and legation to the United States, the Government of which extends a like courtesy to the American embassy or legation thereto, 1 copy, to be supplied by the Superintendent of Documents upon requisition of the Secretary of State; to the Pan American Union, 2 copies; to the Government Printing Office, for official use, 5 copies; to the Superintendent of Documents, 2 copies; and to each executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government, the head of which shall cause daily examination to be made of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of noting the publication of and the immediate issuing of requisitions for documents and reports relating to his department, office, or establishment, a sufficient number of copies required for official use, which shall be charged to his respective printing allotment or appropriation available therefor.

Of the Senate reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 150 copies, and to the House document room, not to exceed 200 copies.

Of the House reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 100 copies, and to the House document room, not to exceed 500 copies.

Of both Senate and House reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Executive Office, 2 copies; to the Secretary of the Senate, not to exceed 10 copies; to the Clerk of the House, not to exceed 20 copies; to the Government Printing Office, for official use, 5 copies; to the Superintendent of Documents, 2 copies; to the Library of Congress, 2 copies: Provided, That reports on consolidated or omnibus private bills shall be printed for the Senate and the House document rooms the same as reports on public bills: Provided further, That reports on bills for the survey of rivers and harbors shall take the distribution of private reports.

Of the Senate and the House numbered documents and reports there shall be bound and distributed to the Executive Office, 2 copies; to the Senate and the House libraries, each, not to exceed 15 copies; to the Library of Congress, for its own use and for international exchanges through the Smithsonian Institution, not to exceed 110 copies, in either bound or unbound form as ordered by the Librarian of Congress; and to the Superintendent of Documents, a sufficient number, in either bound or unbound form, to enable him to make distribution to depository libraries: Provided, That only such Senate and House reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions may be included in the distribution to international exchanges and depository libraries as shall be deemed of public importance by the Superintendent of Documents, but one copy of every report shall be distributed to the library of the documents office. The printing and binding provided for by this section shall be done in the manner directed by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. There is growing constantly, as the House has enlarged and as the country grows, much of important printing, including hearings on the appropriation bills and on revenue bills and other bills. Has the law been changed touching the printing of hearings upon order of committees?

Mr. KIESS. The committees have the same rights under this bill that they have had heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether it would be this committee or whether it would go to the Committee on Accounts. I know that the committee of which I have the honor to be a member during a session might order an amount of printing that could be placed in bulk between my two hands. In the case of the Committee on Ways and Means the amount probably is much greater. Then there is the Committee on the Judiciary and other important committees that require a great deal of printing. But there is only one committee of the House, so far as I know or believe, that indexes its hearings; and inasmuch as Members have so much business, it is impossible for them to become familiar without indexes to the hearings. The Committee on Appropriations, I believe, has always had its clerk index the hearings. Is that a matter that comes within the charge of the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. KIESS. It has nothing to do with the bill under discussion. It would be a matter of each committee having enough clerical help to do the indexing. They are permitted under resolution adopted at the beginning of a session to have printed what is necessary for the use of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know of more than one committee that indexes its hearings, and I undertake to say that the Committee on Appropriations, with less clerical help than any other committee of its importance in the House, with more hearings—unless it might be occasionally when the Committee on Ways and Means is sitting upon revenue bills—is the only committee that has all of its hearings indexed. You might just as well not have hearings printed unless they are indexed. With the time that Representatives take necessarily in answering calls of their constituents and getting, hop, skip, and jump, if possible, outside of the knowledge of the various reports of committees on important bills, the hearings which are without indexes are not of great use to the membership and are of no use practically to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to take the time of the House, but I would be glad to know if it is in the power of the gentleman's committee to report legislation, or an amendment to this bill, to provide for the indexing of committee hearings?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that I fully agree with what he says as to the importance of the indexing of hearings, and the Committee on Printing of the House, of which I have the honor of being chairman, does index all of its hearings, and the Joint Committee on Printing, made up of the members of the Senate and House Printing Committees, does the same. It is unfortunate that all the committees do not do this; but I do not believe this section is the proper one to provide for its enforcement.

Mr. CANNON. I do not care who does it, but I should like to see it done speedily on this or some other bill, and it seems to me that the committee of which the gentleman is chairman might easily provide for it by an amendment.

Mr. KIESS. I think in section 7, on page 21, at the end of the proviso there will be a place where we can add an amendment. When we reach that section of the bill perhaps the gentleman from Illinois will offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I am not an expert drafter of amendments. I merely want to suggest that that matter be passed over unless the gentleman can mature it before the bill is concluded.

Mr. KIESS. I will offer this amendment at the end of section 7.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if you would do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ELSTON). The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6, PAR. 4. The Public Printer shall prepare and bind six complete sets of the printed bills and resolutions of each House of Congress, the volumes when bound to be preserved for reference, as follows: Two in the Library of Congress and one each in the document room and the library of each House.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There have been two hours' debate upon this bill, most of that time being used in discussing the high cost of living and the recent war, which closed some 8 or 10 months ago.

I have moved to strike out the last word for the purpose of trying to get some information about this bill. I understand that the object of the bill is to save quite a sum of money—how much money?

Mr. KIESS. Half a million dollars a year.

Mr. KEARNS. How do you estimate that there will be a saving of half a million dollars?

Mr. KIESS. From reports from the Public Printer showing what will be saved in the way of publications.

Mr. KEARNS. I have not had time to read this bill, having only gotten in this morning.

Mr. KIESS. Has the gentleman seen the report of the committee which accompanies the bill?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; I have seen the report. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill includes in any way the expense of printing stationery for the various committees?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. In what way does it limit the expenditure of money for the printing of stationery for the various committees of the House and Senate?

Mr. KIESS. The method of ordering stationery for the committees is the same under this bill as under the present law. It is ordered through the Clerk of the House by the chairmen of the various committees.

Mr. KEARNS. There has been no change then? This law does not change existing law as to the printing of committee stationery?

Mr. KIESS. We have inserted a provision that committee stationery shall not be used for campaign purposes.

Mr. KEARNS. I am advised that a great many Members of Congress get a large part, at least, of their stationery from the committees to which they belong. I have always been under the impression that each Member is allowed $125 to defray the expenses of his stationery for the year. Now, does it seem right to this committee that some Members should be furnished their stationery through the committees and still receive their $125 to defray that expense? It all comes from the Government after all, and has to be paid for by taxation. I was just wondering whether or not this bill corrected that seeming evil.

Mr. KIESS. This bill is supposed to restrict the use of committee stationery to committee business, and it is expected that the Member will purchase the stationery for his own use.

Mr. KEARNS. I understand the gentleman to say that it is supposed to limit it. Does it do so?

Mr. KIESS. After all, you have to put the Member pretty much on his honor about that.

Mr. KEARNS. I would think it would be very easy to cut out the printing of stationery and letterheads and envelopes for the use of committees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me answer the gentleman. An effort is being made, as everyone knows, by the Joint Committee on Printing to reduce governmental printing everywhere. The Clerk of the House undertook to request the chairmen of committees this year to reduce their orders for stationery, and practically all chairmen did make such reductions. On top of that, the House Committee on Printing authorized the Clerk of the House to reduce the orders further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, since I am engaged in an effort to obtain information, I will ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. The chairman of the committee has just pointed out this further provision in the bill:

Provided further, That no letterheads, envelopes, or blank letter paper, furnished as provided in this paragraph, shall be used in furtherance of the candidacy of any Member for renomination or reelection.

That is at the bottom of page 22. It seems that any Member would be at liberty, however, to go to his committee, if he is fortunate enough to get the chairman of the committee to give him a supply of letterheads and envelopes, and use them in his private correspondence. Now, it seems to me that the same authority that this committee have to limit the use of these letterheads and envelopes in furthering a Member's campaign would extend to the prohibiting of the use of committee stationery for the correspondence of individual Members. It seems to me that that ought to be done. There is no reason why a Member should be given $125 per year to defray the expense of stationery and that he should then be allowed to save the $125 for some other purpose and go to some committee or committees of which he happens to be a member and, at Government expense, receive stationery enough to do him throughout the year except for campaign purposes. I am going to ask unanimous consent to allow this paragraph to be passed over at this time and be permitted to return to it later.

Mr. KIESS. We have not yet reached that paragraph.

Mr. KEARNS. When we do reach it, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that as a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. KIESS. We have not reached section 10, to which the gentleman refers. When we come to that section there will be opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. I am under the impression that I will not have my amendment ready at that time, and I am going to ask now unanimous consent that it be passed over; that I be allowed the privilege of returning to the section for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will have the opportunity of making that request at the time the section is reached.

Mr. KEARNS. And, further, I wanted to ask about these manila envelopes being distributed broadcast to the Members of this House and, I suppose, to the Senate. Is there any provision in the bill to limit that distribution?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill which limits the furnishing of manila envelopes free to Members, and it applies in this way: At the present time Members pay for the printing of their speeches, but they are furnished envelopes without cost. Under the provisions of this bill they not only pay for their speeches, but for the envelopes in which to inclose the speeches, but other envelopes in which to send out public documents are still furnished free.

Mr. KEARNS. This bill does not correct that evil, then?

Mr. KIESS. It corrects the evil to the extent of the envelopes used for speeches.

Mr. KEARNS. But it is limited to speeches?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. If anyone wants to use one of these envelopes for the purpose of carrying on his private correspondence, he is still at liberty to do so?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I am still seeking information and I am going to trespass upon the time of the House to again make a request for two minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Make it five, for I want to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. KEARNS. Very well, for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there not a penalty of $300 for the use of a franked envelope for private purposes?

Mr. KEARNS. Does not the gentleman from Missouri believe that the penalty has come to be rather a joke?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it ought to be enforced.

Mr. KEARNS. It is not enforced, is it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know. I do not run the Post Office Department.

Mr. KEARNS. I know the gentleman does not; but the gentleman has been a Member of this body for 25 or 30 years and I ask him if he has ever known of a Member of Congress being arrested or punished in any way for a misuse of the mails in this respect?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never did.

Mr. KEARNS. And never will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They ran amuck I think here some years ago about shipping furniture and typewriters, and so forth.

Mr. FOCHT. And laundry.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know how others do, and I do not suppose I am a bit better than the other Members of Congress about this, but I have instructed my secretary ever since I came here that if there was any doubt about whether a letter ought to be stamped or not, to stamp it.

Mr. KEARNS. I have given my secretary that instruction, but he always resolves the doubt in favor of the Member of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I told him to resolve the doubt in favor of the Government.

Mr. KEARNS. They do not often do that, I think.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I wanted to inform the gentleman that there is no penalty attached to a misuse by a Congressman. The only remedy the Government has is to sue him or take other legal steps for the collection of the postage which he should have paid.

Mr. KEARNS. Then, if I should send a letter that is not frankable, I would be sued by the Government for the 2 cents that would be due?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman is sending a letter which is not frankable under his frank, he will not incur any penalty beyond the postage that he should have paid.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is this $300 penalty that is printed on the envelope?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is not found on a Congressman's stationery. That is a law applicable to certain departments and bureaus.

Mr. KEARNS. Then, if the chairman of the committee will permit, I would ask this: On these manila envelopes which we sometimes use, there is printed the fact that it contains a public document?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose one were to insert in that a letter. The letter certainly would not be a public document. Is there a penalty against sending a private letter even on Government business in an envelope that is marked a public document?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it would be all right to put into the envelope a letter containing the words "public document," a letter about public business, undoubtedly. I want to get back to one thing that gentlemen were talking about when I came into the room, and that is about envelopes for speeches. I do not know the fact to be, but I take it to be, that the Printing Office, in figuring on a job of printing speeches, figures in the cost of envelopes.

If it does not, it ought to do so. Now, they figure, as I understand it, 10 per cent profit to the Government on the printing of these speeches. I know this, that you can go down town, or could several years ago, and if you are going to have a large number of speeches printed of any considerable length you could get them 10 per cent cheaper at a private printing office than at the Government Printing Office. I tried that experiment once. I made a speech once that I thought a good deal of. It had 32 pages in it. And on the bill for the speeches

I think it was $97 I saved by having them printed at a private office. Of course, they do not use as good paper as the Government. They do not have as wide margin as those printed at the Government Printing Office. They take the leads out, and it reduces the quantity, size, and so forth, but the average citizen believes, very erroneously—I have written it up three or four times, one way and another—that a Member of either House can order all the speeches printed that he wants free and they can get all the public documents they want free. Of course, we understand that is not true, and if the gentleman running this committee will get the people to understand and know that fact it would be well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to the law regulating the use of a Congressman's frank. We get franked envelopes, and they are marked "public document, free," or "official business, free." Whatever head the matter comes under, it is stigmatized always with the word "free." That seems to me to be a very nonsensical thing. If we are going to send out a public document, why detract from its value by putting "free" on it. The people who receive it, of course, look at the "free" plastered over it and the document or other matter is damned in their eyes at the very beginning. They consider that it is something that is "free," and hence is of no value. When we write a letter to a constituent on official business, why stigmatize it on the outside as "free," and so worthless, no good, nonsensical? We should not detract from the value of the matter we send out by such a label. It is in derogation of the dignity of Congress. I think we owe it to ourselves, to the dignity of a great legislative body, if we are going to be allowed to use the frank, that we be allowed it under terms consistent with dignity and with good taste. It is very foolish, it seems to me, to put such a nonsensical label on a Congressman's correspondence.

Mr. KIESS. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to section 16 of this act, in which we change that word "free," and we put in the words "postage free." Would that improve it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. As a matter of sound sense what is the use of putting "postage free" on it? Does not the man who gets it have sense enough to see it has not got a stamp on it, and has he not got sense enough to know that a Congressman writing on official business can send out letters without paying postage? Why stigmatize it? Why put a label on it? Why indicate to the man there is something about it that is less worthy than if it were under a stamp? A Congressman's letters are entitled to as much respect if sent under frank as if stamped. If there is nothing worth while in them, if they are unworthy, they ought not to be sent, no matter what the label is. I insist it is a matter of the dignity of this body. It should be left to the Congressman to say whether it shall be sent under his frank or not. It is a matter of taste with him. It is a matter of honesty with him. This quibbling over a label or whatever else it may be in the matter of official correspondence, it seems to me, is unworthy of the respect we owe ourselves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to let me tell why it is necessary?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why what is necessary?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why the word "free," or "official business," or "postage free," or something of that kind should be on it. I will tell the gentleman why. The gentleman himself might be out there in Alaska——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was going to say to the gentleman that it is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will tell the gentleman why it is necessary. Suppose any Member of Congress should be out there in Alaska and desired to drop a letter in the box, an official letter, and write his name on it, he will find it is not recognized out there——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am too good a friend of the postal employees and I have too much respect for the postmasters of this country to think that we have such jackasses in those offices that they do not know that a Congressman can send mail marked "official business" without putting a stamp on it. The mere fact that the envelope is labeled "free" does not necessarily mean that it contains matter which would properly go under the frank and the postmaster is not given any useful information by the label "free." It is simply a nonsensical label and it seems to me time to recognize that fact.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, after all, these things grow up. Even so late as when I first came to the House it was not customary to have the name of the Congressman printed on the envelope. The custom even then was, and it is not so very long ago, for the Member either to sign his name with pen and ink, or in many cases they had a stamp which they stamped on the envelope, and one can readily see how the practice and the law developed. Originally the word "free" was placed upon the envelope over the signature of a Member of Congress to designate the fact that it was free under the law. He wrote his name and he wrote the word "free." After a while, when Members obtained the help of stenographers and sent out communications in larger quantities, the labor of writing the name or even the labor of stamping the name upon the envelope was so great that we commenced to furnish autograph signatures to the Printing Office and they commenced to print the name on the envelope.

Probably it does not make any great amount of difference whether we are authorized to send correspondence merely by signing "Name, M. C.," or whether we shall certify it is entitled to go free by "Name, M. C." I can not quite agree with my distinguished friend from Alabama that the word "free" on there indicates that it is worthless. My constituents, I am happy to say, have not considered my communications to them worthless because they are marked "free," and I am sure that is the case with the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That any committee or commission of Congress or of either House authorized to hold hearings or to conduct investigations, may have printed for its use not to exceed 1,000 copies in all of any hearing before such committee or commission upon pending legislation; but no such committee or commission may have printed more than 500 copies in all of any other matter preparatory to congressional legislation and germane to its official business, and such matter shall not exceed 100 printed pages in any one instance, except as may be specifically authorized by either House: Provided, That hearings and other publications of each committee and commission shall be numbered consecutively throughout a Congress.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 21, line 8, after the word "Congress," insert:

"Provided further, That all hearings shall be indexed by the committee or commission ordering the same to be printed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10, PAR. 1. All letterheads, envelopes, tables, forms, hearings, and other printed matter, blank books and paper, and binding required for the official use of the Senate and the House, officers and committees thereof, shall be furnished by the Public Printer upon requisition of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, respectively: Provided, That printing and binding for the use of congressional commissions or joint committees shall be furnished the same as for committees of the Senate: Provided further, That no letterheads, envelopes, or blank letter paper, furnished as provided in this paragraph, shall be used in furtherance of the candidacy of any Member for renomination or reelection: Provided further, That the Public Printer is hereby authorized to send through the mails, under his frank, such printed letterheads, envelopes, and frank slips as may be so ordered for the official use of a Member at his home.

SEC. 10, PAR. 2. Upon requisition of the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House, the Public Printer shall furnish appropriately printed letterheads and envelopes and blank letter paper to the stationery rooms of their respective Houses for sale to Members at cost of paper and envelopes, prepaid, and the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, respectively, shall reimburse the Public Printer for such letterheads, envelopes, and paper from the stationery appropriation credited to the Member ordering the same or from moneys received from him for such purpose, as said Member may elect: Provided, That any Member or officer of Congress desiring embossed instead of printed letterheads or envelopes may order the same by prepaying as herein provided, the cost thereof in excess of the amount that ordinary printing would cost the Government: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall prevent the purchase by the officers of the Senate and the House of such stationery and blank books as may be necessary for sale to Members in the stationery rooms of the two Houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] desired to make a reservation as to this section?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KEARNS. The request is for unanimous consent that we may return to this section at any time before the committee rises.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to this section at any time before the committee rises. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16, PAR. 1. The Public Printer shall furnish, at cost, to Members of Congress franked envelopes or slips ready for mailing such Government publications and extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a Member may order printed at his own expense at the Government Printing Office. Envelopes or slips so furnished shall be printed in black ink only and contain in the upper left-hand corner thereof the following words: "United States Senate," or "House of Representatives, U. S.," "Part of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," or "Government publication," "Postage free"; in the upper right-hand corner, the facsimile signature or the name of the Member ordering the same, and the letters "V. P.," "U. S. S." or "M. C."; in the lower right-hand corner the name of the State or Territory or city, if the principal part of the Member's district is included in such city; and in the upper left-hand corner may also be printed, in case of an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the name of the Member, the date, the topic or subject matter, and a quotation from the RECORD of not to exceed 30 words. No other words shall be printed thereon except the title of a Government publication which may be mailed under such franks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to ask the chairman if this provision with respect to what shall go on such an envelope, as has been described in this paragraph, is exactly correct? Does it not convey a wrong impression to the general public? In other words, a Member of Congress has the privilege of ordering copies of remarks or any portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and has the privilege of sending them out under his frank to any person in the United States through the mails. Now, on each one of these envelopes heretofore under the law the word "free" has to be printed, and still under the provisions of this bill it must be kept there. Now, the only reason for that word "free" is that the document is transmitted freely through the mails under the frank and that the frank is in lieu of postage, for, as a matter of fact, although not understood by the public—and it is a matter, I might say, for which we are continually criticized through the newspapers—Members of Congress pay the Public Printer out of their own pocket for every speech that we have printed down at the Government Printing Office, the public believing that it costs us nothing and that such documents are furnished absolutely free to us, when, as a matter of fact, we pay for them. For instance, I might mention that I wanted to send my colleagues the copy of some remarks I made concerning a bill over here—the pending Nolan-Kenyon bill—and I did send on day before yesterday each one of you a copy of it, and I also sent each Senator and others copies of it, and I paid $460.13 to the Public Printer for this one speech, and to-day I paid the Public Printer $158.73 for additional copies of this speech, making a total of $618.86 I have paid the Public Printer for this one speech, yet it is marked "free." It did not come free to me.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman I will say that in the bill we have provided the words "postage free" instead of the word "free," and if the Members want to get rid of the word "free" I will offer a committee amendment to change that to read "official business."

Mr. BLANTON. All I want to do is to call to the attention of the public generally that when Congressmen do send this matter out—I do not know whether it does the public any good or not, but I presume it does; I presume our people at home have an inherent right to know something of what we are doing here as their representatives in Congress—when we see fit to send them matters concerning action taken on the floor here from time to time we have a right to do it, but when we pay for it out of our own pockets, with our good money, they ought not to be told continually through the press that this is free and that it is furnished free to Congressmen, and they—the people—are paying the bill and the Congressmen are getting the benefit of it. I am willing and desirous of my people knowing what I do and what I do not do here, and I spend considerable of my own money keeping them posted. I want to keep in touch with them, and I want my people to keep in touch with me.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 26, line 16, after the word "publication," strike out the words "postage free" and insert in lieu thereof "official business."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 16, on page 26, by inserting after the word "furnish," in line 7, the word "free" and striking out the words "at cost" immediately following the word "furnish."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILLMAN: Page 26, line 7, after the word "furnish," insert the word "free" and strike out the words "at cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill just why he thinks the Members of Congress should penalize themselves by voting for this provision which proposes to compel Members to pay for that which they have been getting free all these years?

I see no objection to compelling Members to pay for the printing of their speeches, but certainly it is a very slight imposition on the Government for it to continue to furnish without charge these envelopes, as it has been doing in the past. Those who at this time are earning salaries like Members of Congress have been hit harder, perhaps, by the high cost of living than any other class of our people. I thought we had passed the time when it seemed necessary to cut our mileage or cut our stationery account in order to attract attention to our love of economy. Certainly the Government can afford to furnish free to Members of Congress the envelopes that are to carry their speeches.

Will the gentleman in charge of the bill explain why he felt it was necessary to strafe Members of Congress to this extent?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman and to the members of the committee that this amendment, if passed, will leave the law as it now exists. The committee, in making this change, felt, after making investigations, that really about three-fourths of the envelopes, the total cost of the same amounting to something like $100,000 per year, were not used by Members for their personal use entirely, but were used by other persons. Anyone knowing that Members of Congress received these envelopes free of charge would feel perfectly free to ask for an unlimited number; but if he knew that the Member had to pay for the envelopes as well as for the printing of the speeches or the documents, it would have a tendency to reduce the number.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. You say the purpose of the committee in proposing section 16 is to prevent outsiders from taking advantage of the fact that Members of Congress have the franking privilege, for the purpose of sending out propaganda. Do you not take care of that matter elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. KIESS. We do, in part.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then do not punish us as you seek to do in this provision. Get after the people who take advantage of Members by using their frank.

Mr. KIESS. We are not standing in the position of insisting on this. We thought here was an opportunity to save some money for the Government, and that so long as Members pay for the printing of their speeches they should also pay for the printing of the envelopes. It is a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand the gentleman does not insist that the provision be not amended as suggested?

Mr. KIESS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN]. Does this apply to the manila envelopes in which we send out the farmers' bulletins?

Mr. KIESS. No.

Mr. DENISON. Just the envelopes we use in sending out our speeches?

Mr. KIESS. Yes. At the present time you pay only for the speeches, and the envelopes are furnished free. I think probably section 17 will take care of the matter of the abuse of this privilege fairly well. If the House feels that it wants to pass this amendment, the committee will not object.

Mr. DENISON. I hope the House will pass this amendment. I think it is a proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16, PAR. 2. The Public Printer shall furnish, without charge, to Members of Congress franked slips or manila envelopes ready for mailing such Government publications as are printed at Government expense for public distribution. Envelopes or slips so furnished shall be printed in black ink only and contain in the upper left-hand corner thereof the following words: "United States Senate," or "House of Representatives, U. S.," "Government publication," "Postage free"; in the upper right-hand corner, the facsimile signature or the name of the Member ordering the same, and the letters "V. P.," "U. S. S.," or "M. C."; in the lower right-hand corner the name of the State or Territory or city, if the principal part of the Member's district is included in such city. No other words shall be printed thereon except the title of a Government publication which may be mailed under such franks: Provided, That any Member desiring white envelopes instead of manila envelopes as provided herein may order the same by prepaying the cost thereof in excess of the amount that such manila envelopes would cost the Government: Provided further, That the Public Printer shall furnish to the Department of Agriculture such franks as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for sending out seeds on congressional orders, which franks shall be printed as provided herein and shall also bear the words "United States Department of Agriculture, Congressional Seed Distribution," or such other printed matter as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, and be of such size and style as may be prescribed by him: Provided further, That the expense of printing franks and franked envelopes as provided for in this paragraph shall be charged to the allotment of appropriation for printing and binding for Congress.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 27, lines 11 and 12, after the word "publication," strike out the words "Postage free" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Official business."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful for any person entitled to congressional franked envelopes or slips under the provisions of this act to furnish the same, either directly or indirectly, to any individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association for the use or benefit of such individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association: Provided, That the foregoing provision shall not apply to any committee or commission of Congress, or either House thereof, but no such committee or commission shall furnish franked envelopes or slips, either directly or indirectly, to any individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association for the use or benefit of such individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for anyone except the Public Printer to print congressional franked envelopes and slips for the mailing of Government publications and extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and all such franked envelopes and slips hereafter printed shall bear the imprint of the Government Printing Office: Provided further, That the Public Printer shall include in his annual report to Congress a statement showing, by name, the number and cost of franked envelopes and slips furnished free to each Member, officer, committee, and commission of Congress during the preceding fiscal year: Provided further, That any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $1,000 for each offense.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENISON: Page 28, line 14, after the word "indirectly," strike out the comma and insert a comma after the word "to," in line 14, and after the comma insert the words "or permit the same to be used by."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Let the Clerk indicate how it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the paragraph will read: "Either directly or indirectly to, or permit the same to be used by, any individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association for the use or benefit of such individual, firm, corporation, committee, organization, or association."

Mr. DENISON. I offer that in order to make it more comprehensive. A man might not furnish it, but he might permit it to be furnished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment at the close of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENISON: Page 29, line 12, after the word "offense," strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words: "and shall forfeit to the United States an amount equal to double the value of such franked envelopes or slips and double the amount of postage that would have been required to send such franked envelopes or franked material through the mail, to be recovered by proper action at law in any court of competent jurisdiction by the Postmaster General of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. PAR. 1. Any Member or officer of the Senate or the House who is entitled by law or resolution to an allotment of Government publications in the folding room of the Senate or the House, or of farmers' bulletins, is hereby authorized to direct the Public Printer, in writing, not to print his respective quota of any such publication which he may not desire for distribution; and, if notice thereof is received prior to printing the same, the Public Printer shall deduct such number from the number of copies to be printed and shall direct the superintendent of the respective folding room or the superintendent of documents not to allot or distribute such publications to the Member or officer of either House so authorizing the Public Printer. The value of the publications not printed as provided herein shall be credited by the superintendent of documents, under direction of the Public Printer, to the Member or officer of either House from whose quota such publications were deducted, and such Member or officer shall be entitled to order of the superintendent of documents Government publications of which there is a free distribution, available for free public distribution by such Member or officer to the amount so credited to him, not exceeding $2,200 each for the Vice President or any Senator, and not exceeding $1,800 each for any Representative, Delegate, Resident Commissioner, or officer of either House who is entitled by law to an allotment of Government publications in any one fiscal year; and the total annual amount of such credits for each person entitled to the same shall be reported to Congress by the superintendent of documents at the beginning of each regular session thereof: Provided, That no credits shall be available or used for any other purpose than as authorized by this section, and they shall not be subject to transfer or assignment from one person to another or in any wise held to be a personal asset of the individual in whose name such credits may be recorded: Provided further, That the superintendent of documents is hereby authorized to exchange, for free public distribution by a Member or officer of either House, publications which he may have available for such purpose for those of equal value which a Member or officer of either House may have to his credit in his respective folding room; and, for the purpose of facilitating such exchanges, the superintendent of each folding room shall advise the superintendent of documents, on request, as to the number of any document that a Member or officer of either House may have to his credit therein: Provided further, That the superintendent of documents shall not supply publications on any valuation or exchange account in excess of the amount lawfully credited to the person having such an account with him; nor shall said superintendent charge any such account with publications at less than the price fixed therefor by the Public Printer, which price shall be uniform and shall be sufficient to cover the cost of paper, printing from plates, and binding: Provided further, That the valuation or exchange credits as provided for herein shall not be available for copies of the speeches of any Member of Congress, officer of the Government, or any other person, in whatever form printed, but this shall not apply to the addresses or messages of the President to Congress or to memorial addresses and statute proceedings authorized to be printed for congressional distribution: Provided further, That in the event of a vacancy in any position entitled to an allotment of Government publications, such credits and documents of the person who held the position shall go to his successor; and all publications allotted to a Member or officer of either House in the folding rooms of the Senate and the House which are not taken by him prior to the expiration of his service in Congress shall be placed to the credit of his successor: Provided further, That any person to whom Government publications are allotted or credited as provided for by law, or any employee or agent of such person, or any officer or employee of Congress or either House thereof, who shall sell or dispose of for gain or profit any publications obtained either directly or indirectly under the provisions of this act shall be fined not more than $1,000: Provided further, That if the Public Printer, the superintendent of documents, or any other officer or employee of the Government Printing Office shall permit or knowingly be party to any violation of this section, whereby the Government shall suffer any loss therefrom, he shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct a typographical error.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. While we are considering the provision to impose a penalty, we provide that if a Member should attempt to dispose of any of these periodicals for gain he would be guilty of a crime and punishable by fine and imprisonment. I do not know that it ever has been done or ever will be done. Why should we not at the same time make it a crime for any person to acquire by purchase or otherwise such Government documents?

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will yield, would it not be pretty difficult, then, to get any evidence if you make them both guilty?

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to make them both guilty.

Mr. DENISON. How would you get any evidence of it, then?

Mr. BLANTON. Why, when adultery is committed both parties are guilty, and yet we get evidence to convict.

Mr. DENISON. I think there is just a little bit of difference between the two cases. In one case there is pretty plain evidence, in the other case there is not.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, sometimes, in the illustrative case mentioned by me, the crime is a most secretive one, and the evidence is not so plain and easily obtainable as the gentleman would imagine, and yet the Government procures the evidence and obtains convictions, even though both parties to the transaction are equally guilty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: On page 33, line 18, after the word "and," strike out the word "statute" and insert in lieu thereof the word "statue."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. The printing of the following publications for congressional distribution as heretofore provided by law shall be discontinued, and the provisions of law requiring that such reports shall be submitted to Congress are hereby repealed: Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce of the United States, Annual Report of Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, Annual Report of the Health Officer of the District of Columbia, Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology, Bulletins of the Bureau of Ethnology, Bulletins of the Bureau of Fisheries, Geological Bulletins, Geological Professional Papers, Geological Water-Supply Papers, Topographic and Geologic Maps and Atlases, Charts of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences, the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, Publications of the Naval Observatory, Annual Report of Field Operations of the Bureau of Soils, Annual Report of the Commercial Relations of the United States with Foreign Countries, Navy Yearbook, and the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Patents with list of patents.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee with respect to the list of publications printed on page 36, which are hereafter to be eliminated from the quota to be allotted to Congressmen and are not to be printed at all. This reads very much like a monthly list of credits that Congressmen have at the document room, and most of these designations are somewhat familiar. Now, are they to be taken off from the list that we are furnished by the document room?

Mr. KIESS. Yes; they are automatically taken off from the list.

Mr. ELSTON. I went over that printed list, which contains the names of the reports to be made to Congress and distributed to Congressmen, and in that list are a great many of the publications mentioned here in section 21 and a great many others which I believe are about as useless for distribution as a good many of those here mentioned. I should like to ask with reference to publications like these, which are not included in section 21: Agricultural Experiment Station papers, Army Register, what they call Finance Papers, United States maps, mounted and unmounted, the Navy Register, Smithsonian papers, and the Statistical Abstract. Of course some of these are valuable and some are not; but I should like to know just why some that I have mentioned are left off from this list.

Mr. KIESS. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that the committee thought this was making a pretty good start, and we followed closely a resolution which was passed by the House in the Sixty-third Congress discontinuing the printing of certain publications. It was passed as a joint resolution, but did not go through the Senate. We took this as an expression from the House that they wanted these particular publications discontinued. Now, with reference to the others, they can be taken care of by each Member under this valuation plan. All he needs to do is to notify the Public Printer that he does not want them in his allotment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman will understand that we selected these publications because the House had taken action on same. As to the others, I agree that a number of them are not very important to Members of Congress, at least to Members representing certain sections, but they can all be taken care of under the valuation plan, whereby a Member not wanting any of these reports can notify the Public Printer, and they will not be allotted to him.

Mr. ELSTON. These mounted United States maps must cost a good deal, and if 20 of them are allotted to each Congressman, that represents 8,000 maps. I do not know what it costs to print them, but of course there is nothing extraordinary about those maps. Under this reservation plan, or what may be called special orders, I do not suppose it is intended that one Member, who has a credit of $1,200 for documents, shall order $1,200 worth of these maps, which are not documents at all. That would be an absurd abuse of the privilege; but I think it is possible under the power that you give here to Members to centralize on certain publications and documents and that some Member might do that very kind of thing.

Mr. KIESS. Let me say to the gentleman that there is a specific appropriation made every year by Congress for the publication of these maps.

Mr. ELSTON. Where is that found?

Mr. KIESS. It is carried in one of the appropriation bills each year.

Mr. DENISON. The sundry civil bill.

Mr. KIESS. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and Congress can stop the printing entirely by refusing to grant the appropriation, if it wishes to do so.

Mr. ELSTON. That is pertinent to an inquiry I was just about to make. It would do no good, then, for me to insert here an amendment to include in the list, in section 21, of discontinued publications, these mounted United States maps?

Mr. KIESS. No; that would be taken care of in another way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman a question or two with reference to several of these documents which it is proposed to discontinue. In section 21, on page 36, I observe in the list the bulletins of the Bureau of Fisheries. Does that refer to the bulletins that the Bureau of Fisheries issues with reference to the character of fish which are edible and which fact is determined by experiments through that bureau?

Mr. KIESS. No; it does not refer to that. The annual bulletin only is referred to here.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Bureau of Fisheries informs me that they have been seriously handicapped in informing the people of the value of food fish because they have no appropriation and have no means, therefore, of informing the people of that fact.

Mr. KIESS. This is the annual bulletin, and each Senator is entitled to receive 10 copies and each Representative 4 copies.

Mr. BRIGGS. This does not affect the food bulletin that they are accustomed to issue?

Mr. KIESS. No; it has nothing to do with that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. For a statement. The Department of Commerce about two or three years ago received an appropriation for instructing in the canning, cooking, and preserving of the dogfish, also called the grayfish. The Department of Commerce under that appropriation commenced to instruct the canners, especially in Massachusetts, upon how to can the dogfish.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. The canners followed the direction of the Department of Commerce, and the result was that last year the Secretary of Commerce came before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for an appropriation, as I now recall, of about $20,000, and this year asked for an appropriation of over $40,000, with which to reimburse the canners, because the department had instructed them along a line that was not in their interest, and their pack could not be used as food at all. The result was that they wanted out of the Treasury of the United States the payment to these canners to reimburse them for following the advice of the Department of Commerce in the manner of cooking dogfish.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not know anything about the experience of the canners with the efforts of the Department of Commerce to inform them about their business, and I do not think that has anything to do with the efforts of the Bureau of Fisheries to instruct the public in respect to fishes that are edible. That is the only matter to which I have reference. I have no reference whatever to the preparation of those foods. It is simply a question of determining whether a certain fish is edible or not. For instance, in the red-snapper fishing off the banks of Yucatan they catch in great numbers certain fish in addition to the red snapper. The Bureau of Fisheries tells me that this fish is a very desirable fish, quite edible, but the people are not educated to it, and they will not buy it in the markets. It is for the purpose of letting the people know through experiment in some way what are edible fishes, and it is for that reason that I am making this inquiry, with respect to the retention of the bulletins of the Bureau of Fisheries.

The only other publication that I am about to make any question in respect to is the Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce of the United States. We are spending millions of dollars here now for the organization of a merchant marine. We have millions of tons of shipping, and it is of the highest importance that people should have these statistics, to determine whether or not it is profitable and to what extent to engage in foreign commerce, where the ships are being used, where they are going, and what commerce they are carrying, and what tonnage is being carried. It does not seem to me to be a wise thing to strike out the publication in respect to the foreign commerce of the United States.

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman understands that this does not provide for doing away with the publication, but it is only the matter of the allotment to Congress. I might say that of this report each Senator is now allowed five copies and each Representative two, and the records of the folding room show that there has been a larger accumulation of this particular document in proportion than of any other.

Mr. BRIGGS. I think that is probably so because we have just started upon our shipping.

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman will be able to get this from the department. They will issue them just the same.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if there are any of these dogfish in the gentleman's district?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; some in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think, then, that the point raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is well taken and that these canners ought to be reimbursed?

Mr. BRIGGS. No; I have no concern at all about them. I think the canners ought to find out for themselves when they engage in that business how to prepare the food. I do not think the Government is running a department of domestic economics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. PAR. 1. The libraries of each executive department and independent establishment of the Government in the District of Columbia, the United States Military Academy, the United States Naval Academy, each State and Territory, the District of Columbia, the government of the Philippine Islands at Manila, the government of Porto Rico at San Juan, the Panama Canal at Balboa Heights, Canal Zone, the Pan American Union, the Public Documents Office, the Historical Library and Museum of Alaska, each land-grant college, and the American Antiquarian Society of Worcester, Mass., and in addition thereto not to exceed one library for each congressional district and Territory and two libraries at large for each State, to be designated by the superintendent of documents under such regulations as shall be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, are hereby constituted depositories of Government publications, and all designations now existing shall be permanent, except as otherwise provided in this act.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In hastily running through section 27, paragraph 1, I notice a reference to the libraries of the country. There are many of them that have been designated to receive public documents from Members of Congress. Is there anything in this act that repeals the law which authorizes those libraries to receive such documents?

Mr. KIESS. No; there is nothing in the law repealing it. In fact, this makes it permanent.

Mr. CANNON. Take the library in my own town, the Carnegie Library in the city of Danville, about 40,000 people. They have been receiving these documents, and as I hastily glanced through three or four pages here——

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman does not find it?

Mr. CANNON. I gathered the impression that possibly they were not to be furnished in the future.

Mr. KIESS. On page 40, in line 7, it says, "and all designations now existing shall be permanent, except as otherwise provided by this act."

Mr. CANNON. And there is no provision that would interfere with that?

Mr. KIESS. No.

Mr CANNON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May such designations be made now? This provision, on page 40, says "all designations now existing." May Members of Congress now make designation for public documents to be furnished to libraries?

Mr. KIESS. Up until the time when this becomes a law, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the postponement will then be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a request made for unanimous consent to return to section 10. That request was granted. If anyone desires to return to that section for the purpose of offering amendment, the committee will do so.

Mr. KIESS. The gentleman who made the request has left, with the understanding that he would not ask it.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8362 had instructed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KIESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. UPSHAW. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two communications, one from the Chamber of Commerce of Atlanta and the other from the Atlanta Federation of Trades, concerning the present railroad situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain communications in reference to the present railroad situation. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long are these communications?

Mr. UPSHAW. I think both together will not make more than a page.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UPSHAW. They are strictly nonpartisan, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure of that. It relates to the present railroad situation?

Mr. UPSHAW. The present railroad and strike situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ALMON, for five days, on account of official business.

To Mr. CANDLER, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

CONGRATULATIONS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to get the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming, the majority leader, and to congratulate him on the work we have done to-day and to call his attention to it as an example that we can still do business.

Mr. MONDELL. If you will only give us a chance. I think the House is to be congratulated on the splendid work which it has done to-day in the passage of this bill, a very important piece of legislation, which will result in a saving of at least half a million of dollars a year, and I am very glad indeed it has been passed. It is an evidence of the ability of the Congress to dispose of business promptly and consider legislation carefully and thoroughly. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I am calling the attention of the majority leader to the suggestion that we continue to try to transact business and pass bills that are now on the Calendar. If so, I think we will dispose of a good deal of business while we have not a quorum here.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I would like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes if I may do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, many Members of this House are members of the order of Knights of Pythias, and will, I feel sure, be interested in a copy of a telegram which I have just received, addressed by the supreme chancellor of the order to the President of the United States, upon the vital question now confronting us on the high cost of living.

In this country of ours, without castes and classes, we have no special groups to exert influence or unite in opposition or support of measures that come before us for consideration, apart from our party political organizations and occasional sporadic groupings of selfish interests with the single aim of furthering the special scheme in which they may be temporarily concerned. The instinct for organization, for acting with friends and comrades, is an old, old human instinct, and in this country it has been the motive power that brought into being the various organizations known as fraternal organizations and to some one of which nearly every adult American belongs. It is a source of gratification to reflect that in every crisis through which the country has passed the fraternal organizations have been ever on the side of righteousness, of civic integrity, and the maintenance of the highest American ideals, and as we have depended on them to throw their mighty potentialities into the scale on the side of justice and liberty in the past, so to-day they are a bulwark of strength for all that is true and enduring in American idealism to rest upon; a mighty force for the inculcation and preservation of the liberty, fraternity, and equality upon which our form of government is founded and an impregnable Gibraltar against the surging waves of Bolshevism, social disorder, and anarchy that threaten to destroy civilization itself in every country in the world.

The order of Knights of Pythias had its birth in this city, the Capital of the Nation, February 19, 1864. It was born from a desire to heal the wounds of the Civil War and restore the spirit of friendship between our people. It was an American institution, born under our flag.

The spirit that was the cause of its birth found response in the hearts of thousands of men—North, South, East, and West—and from the little band of 13 men in 1864 there has grown a great organization of practically 750,000 men.

The principles of its organization—friendship, charity, and benevolence—have appealed to all, and the sun now never sets upon its lodges.

It has played an important part in American history. It has been a source of strength to our Nation in time of peace and in time of war. It has brought men closer together. It has made them less selfish. It has contributed to good citizenship. It has been true to the home and domestic relations. It has protected and cared for the widow and the fatherless. It has always been true to the flag of our country.

In this land and others it cares for those who are sick or in distress. Its homes for the orphan, the aged, and the helpless are its brilliant jewels in almost every State of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACGREGOR. May I proceed for one minute more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACGREGOR. In times of war it has sent to the front thousands of its members, and in the recent war was active and energetic in all activities tending toward victory and toward caring for the desires and needs of those who fought as well as those loved ones left behind by our fighting boys at the front. [Applause.]

It has always been keenly alive to the great questions confronting our Nation, and as an evidence of its interest in the present problems and desire to share in their solution, with the permission of the House, I will insert in the RECORD a telegram recently sent by the supreme chancellor, Hon. Charles S. Davis, of Colorado, to the President of the United States. [Applause.]

DENVER, COLO., August 5, 1919.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

The Government of the United States demonstrated its mighty power in mobilizing the greatest Army ever assembled to wage battle against autocracy and militarism. Our patriots gave unfaltering evidence of valor and purpose and succeeded in rendering gigantic service for the cause of liberty and righteousness. The Government of the United States commandeered America's resources to assure victory for the cause of her allies and America. In the interest of the people the Government of the United States invoked its authority and power in fixing prices during the war to thwart the avarice of the profiteer. The war ended in a glorious victory. Shall we now have the peace that should be ours as a just reward for the sacrifices made? The Government of the United States must again invoke the strong arm of its authority and take immediate and, if necessary, drastic steps to bring relief in the matter of the high cost of living. The economic poise of our country is threatened. We are confronted with a national crisis unless the Government acts promptly. The Order of Knights of Pythias pledged to the Government its man power and all its resources to aid in winning the war. The Order of Knights of Pythias again exhibited its patriotism and loyalty and pledged to the Government its man power and all its resources to aid in the after-war readjustments and reconstruction. The Order of Knights of Pythias represents no class. It represents humanity, and in the interest of humanity the supreme chancellor, speaking for the order and in behalf of all the people, urges upon the President of this great Republic to cause to be made of first importance a thorough investigation of the impending economic situation within the borders of our own country and insist upon the stern application of remedies that must be applied to relieve the situation fraught with danger and calculated to disturb if not destroy the fruits of our own victory. Those engaged in promoting selfish ends by exploiting the people must be brought to account. The Nation must not be permitted to suffer at the hands of the exploiter of the Nation's peace, prosperity, and happiness. Immediate action is imperative. The Government must act.

CHARLES S. DAVIS,
Supreme Chancellor of the Order of Knights of Pythias.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, August 14, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Labor submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation to enable the Secretary of Labor to render aid and assistance to the President in connection with his efforts to combat and cope with conditions causing the high cost of living (H. Doc. No. 185); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of Commerce submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations required for certain bureaus of the Department of Commerce to enable them to cooperate in the effort being put forth at the suggestion of the President to reduce the cost of living (H. Doc. No. 186); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8117) for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Falls, Wyoming County, Pa., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 229), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for just compensation for their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 230), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SWEET: A bill (H. R. 8421) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Worthington, Iowa, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (by request): A bill (H. R. 8422) providing for the recording of mortgages on vessels and notation thereof on certificates of registry or enrollment and license, creating jurisdiction in the district courts of the United States for foreclosure of such mortgages, and providing procedure in connection therewith; also providing for maritime liens upon vessels for necessaries, etc., and their enforcement, and subordinating the same to the liens of mortgages; repealing all conflicting acts; and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. KELLER: A bill (H. R. 8423) providing additional compensation to certain employees of the Post Office Department for overtime service; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8424) for increased compensation to postal employees during the current fiscal year; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

By Mr. KINCHELOE: A bill (H. R. 8425) granting additional pay to the officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By the SPEAKER: Memorial from the Legislature of the State of Montana, urging appropriation for the irrigation of projects throughout the West; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 8426) granting an increase of pension to Ephraim L. Schanck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8427) granting a pension to Mary E. Frederick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 8428) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Fiscus; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, petition of National Civil Liberties Bureau, New York, regarding peace-time sedition law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 14, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

To Thee, O God, who hast ever been our refuge and our strength, we come lifting up our souls in prayer, that we may receive that inspiration, that strength, which shall enable us to act well our part in the affairs of this day, that Thy purposes may be fulfilled in us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INVESTIGATION OF THOMAS J. MOONEY.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized to continue the consideration of a privileged resolution.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 225) directing the Secretary of Labor to report certain facts in connection with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney and others to the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the full resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 225.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

(1) Copies of all such instructions mentioned by John B. Densmore as having been received by him during the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918, he having said:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 1, 1918.

"Hon. W. B. WILSON,
"Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigation."

(2) The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918.

(3) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor.

(4) What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney.

(5) Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip, and expense of same itemized.

(6) Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau and expense of trip itemized in detail.

(7) Attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail.

(8) Attach report of John B. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco, with full statement of expense thereof itemized in detail.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on November 1, 1918, Mr. John B. Densmore, Director of the United States Employment Service, filed a report with the Secretary of Labor, wherein he states, in the beginning of it, that in pursuance to instructions he received from the Department of Labor during the preceding six months, that is, during May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918, he, John B. Densmore, Director of the United States Employment Service, had conducted a secret investigation in San Francisco, Calif., regarding the Mooney case. And in this report he goes on to state that he saw fit to install a dictograph machine in the office of the district attorney of California for certain purposes.

This resolution asks the Secretary of Labor to give Congress the benefit of those instructions which the Secretary of Labor had given John B. Densmore during those six months. I, for one Member of Congress, would like to know what those instructions were. I would like to know what the Department of Labor had to do with interfering with the just punishment of a convicted anarchist who has been convicted through all the highest courts of California.

This is the inquiry that we make of the Secretary of Labor. It is a reasonable inquiry. We previously asked the Secretary of Labor, in a resolution passed almost unanimously by the House of Representatives some time ago, to tell us the expense, to give us the expense itemized, of this investigation of the Mooney case. The Secretary of Labor came back in a document which is a public document now, addressed to the Speaker, in which he says to the House of Representatives, "I do not deem it compatible with the public interest to give you Members of the House of Representatives this information." That is his judgment. It is a question of whether or not his judgment is supported by the judgment of the Members of this House. I would like to have that information.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Did the resolution call for the information in his discretion, or otherwise?

Mr. BLANTON. No, it did not; and the debate on the floor of the House at that time showed conclusively to the Secretary of Labor that it was not the intention of this House to leave it in his discretion, because the Committee on Labor, to which this resolution was referred, came in with a report and had committee amendments attached to the resolution, wherein they sought to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and this House voted down each and every one of those committee amendments, and passed the resolution just as I introduced it in the House.

The debate on the floor of this House at that time showed that it was the intention of this House not to leave it to his discretion, but to require him to furnish to the membership of this House the information that we asked of him. And in the face of it he comes back and says, "You have asked for information, but I do not care to give it to you. I put my judgment up against the judgment of the 435 Members of the House of Representatives," if you please.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If you pass this resolution and he declines to give the information, then what action do you suggest?

Mr. BLANTON. Then I hope that my colleagues will see fit to bring him before the bar of this House for appropriate action. That is an authority that this House has.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And he might be impeached, might he not?

Mr. BLANTON. "He might be impeached," my colleague from Indiana says. I am not informed as to that, as to whether or not he might be impeached; but I do know that it is a reasonable inquiry to make, when we vote money to a department for proper uses, for us to ask the department head to tell us how he spends that money. I want to know how the money that I helped to appropriate is spent.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BLANTON. I gladly yield.

Mr. DENISON. Has the gentleman from Texas been given any information from any source as to why it would be incompatible with the public interest to give Congress this information?

Mr. BLANTON. I have my private reasons for believing so and so, but I might do the Secretary of Labor an injustice in stating them here, and I want to be fair always, and I want to give him the benefit of the doubt until I am forced to believe to the contrary.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. I do know that ever since this resolution has been subject to call on various occasions here the Secretary of Labor has seen fit to leave his place of work down there in the Department of Labor and come up here and occupy a seat in this House, hobnobbing with the Members; I do not know what for.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. I gladly yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In what respect does this resolution differ from the one previously passed by the House?

Mr. BLANTON. It is to let him know that when we send him word that we want information we mean business.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is a second demand, then?

Mr. BLANTON. It is carrying out precedents established in every legislative body in the world, to give him another opportunity to answer.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know whether the gentleman has caught my question exactly or not. Is this resolution identical with the other one?

Mr. BLANTON. This directs him to send us forthwith the information, regardless of his statement that he deems it incompatible with the public interest to do so.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The other one directed him to furnish it?

Mr. BLANTON. It directed, but not in a way to let him know he had it to do. And this resolution also embraces several additional requests for information and records out of his office.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I gladly yield.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good plan if more of the Cabinet members would spend more of their time on the floor of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. It would, unless they came here to try to prevent legislation from being passed that ought to be passed, and if they do that, then they ought to be severely criticized for it.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think that the visit of the gentleman he refers to had anything to do with his resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. I know that after he sat here day after day talking with Members, it took me a terribly long time to get the resolution up, with every kind of technical objection imaginable raised against its consideration.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think that had anything to do with his failure?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. I met with a good many obstacles, and if it had not been for the help of the able and distinguished minority leader here [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] in helping me to overcome some of the obstacles that were placed in the way of this resolution by way of points of order, I doubt whether I would ever have gotten it up.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that gentlemen on that side really gave you all your support?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. On the other resolution there was very little opposition to it from either side. I do not think the gentleman would like to have his constituents believe that he is against this resolution. This is not a party issue. It is an issue of loyalty, and the weeding out of anarchy and anarchists from our Government. I am for my country, right or wrong; but I am for departments of the Government only when they are right, even though they are members of my party. As a Democrat, I stand for making the Democratic Party mean to the country the best party in the world, worthy of confidence, and guaranteeing honest and loyal administration of the affairs of this Nation. Some Democrats have a false idea that they must not criticize a department, even though it is wrong.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Gladly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask who it is that you and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] are talking about being here?

Mr. BLANTON. The Secretary of Labor, Hon. W. B. WILSON.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will explain, if the gentleman will permit me. Everything ought to be fair. The Secretary of Labor was over here on two or three different days, a week or so ago, but he was not over here about that resolution at all. He came here to see the gentleman from Wyoming and myself, to see if we could not get that little resolution through authorizing the President to invite people to come here to this labor convention in October. That is what he was seeing us about at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri, of course, would know what business the Secretary of Labor had up with him, but I presume that he could not know the business that the Secretary of Labor might have transacted with other Members who were inclined to be lenient with all matters affecting labor.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman know himself that the Secretary of Labor spoke about this other matter at all?

Mr. BLANTON. I am just drawing a conclusion.

Mr. ASWELL. Generally the gentleman's speeches are conclusions only.

Mr. BLANTON. And sometimes they are based upon facts. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield just for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to be fair. I will gladly yield, if I have done any injustice——

Mr. MONDELL. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. I know nothing about the purpose which brought the Secretary of Labor to the House, except so far as my conversation with him was concerned, and that related entirely to the matter that has been referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the coming labor conference here in October.

Mr. BLANTON. My suggestion was not directed to the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming or to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, because when these two gentlemen whom I have just mentioned lock arms together and work in double harness no man in the House can get anything up against their wishes. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Gladly.

Mr. ASWELL. If the gentleman did not refer to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], to whom did he refer?

Mr. BLANTON. Generally. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen of the House, this resolution further directs the Secretary of Labor to send to the House vouchers covering the expenses of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer, three different men from the Department of Labor, who made trips from San Francisco to Los Angeles. I will state to the Members of the House that that will be a very interesting document to the gentlemen of the House when we get it, to show the items of expense incurred by those three men, in the hiring of a high-powered automobile to make trips from San Francisco to Los Angeles—not on a proper mission of business for this Government, because, if my information, which comes straight, is correct, these men went there for other purposes, in violation of laws instead of in enforcement of laws.

Mr. F. R. Welsh, a citizen of Philadelphia, furnished me with some very valuable information in connection with the Mooney case. As soon as the attention of the Secretary of Labor and the attention of Mr. Densmore was called to it Mr. Densmore, as the representative of the Department of Labor, sent two men this last spring to Philadelphia, who stayed there six weeks, to investigate F. R. Welsh because he had given information against the department. I ask for their reports and the expense of that trip. Has Congress ever authorized the Secretary of the Department of Labor to send men all over the country to investigate this, that, and the other man because he gives information against the Department of Labor?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. For a question.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If the accounting officers of the Government were under the jurisdiction and control of Congress, we would have no occasion to call for these vouchers, because they would have to come here in regular process of law, and there would be no occasion to divide the Lone Star State in its allegiance.

Mr. BLANTON. If we give the branches of the Government to understand that whenever they spend the money of this Government they have got to do it according to law, a step in the right direction for the proper reform will have been made by this House of Representatives. That is the goal for which I am working.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. What does the gentleman propose to do with these reports if he gets them?

Mr. BLANTON. I want the gentleman and others to get the benefit of them, and to know what they contain, because I believe that in voting on measures now pending before various committees, and which will likely come before the Congress, gentlemen will be better prepared to vote intelligently upon them if they have this information.

Mr. DYER. Did the gentleman get any reply to the resolution we passed before? Did he get any report?

Mr. BLANTON. We got a partial report.

Mr. DYER. Where is it?

Mr. BLANTON. In the document room. It has been there for some time, published.

Mr. DYER. How many Members of Congress know anything about it?

Mr. BLANTON. I presume they know what the RECORD contains, for it contains much valuable information. I presume Members of Congress read the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman ought to get such report and read it to the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it would take me about four times longer than the time I have to do that. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up any further time on this resolution unless there is some other question that is desired to be asked, but I do want to say this, that anarchy in this country can not exist unless it is fostered and encouraged and permitted by the citizenship of the land. Anarchy can not exist if every officer of this Government is against anarchy, and the time has come in the affairs of this Government when the people of the United States are looking to Congress to see to it that at least every officer of the Government is against anarchy and does not smile upon it or permit it. If any officer of this Government has been encouraging anarchy, if any officer of this Government has been assisting it and aiding it and abetting it, the time has come for Congress to call a halt. The law abiding people are looking to us to see to it that it is stopped. Law and order must prevail in this Government. The time has come when we must see to it that every citizen, and at least every Government officer, obeys the law; that law and order must be reestablished and must be respected. We have no place for anarchists. We must send them out of this land, and if we can not get rid of them in any other way we should hang them as high as Haman. That is all this resolution seeks to help to bring about.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were—ayes 67, noes 14.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill (H. R. 8376) relating to the salaries of postal clerks be changed from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the reference of the bill referred to, affecting a change of salary of postal employees, be transferred from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman whether or not each of the committees have been consulted about this matter?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understand this bill has been introduced by the gentleman himself and referred to his committee merely by mistake.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it was not referred by mistake. The Chair thinks the rule properly refers it to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. The Chair is indifferent, of course, where it goes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to object to the request which takes it from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I was not going to object; I was simply going to call attention to the fact that the measure which I introduced in regard to the increase in salary of the district attorney of the eastern district of Louisiana for a number of years has been going to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that under the present régime it has been sent to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and I want to know how I stand in that matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read the rules. It seems to the Chair very clear upon the wording of the rule that these changes of salary go——

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have no complaint to make. My bill is so meritorious I would be willing to submit it to any committee of the House.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand a matter of this kind is privileged, and I therefore move that the reference be changed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in order to move to do this thing the gentleman has to have the authority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 4317:

Legislative propositions relating to the fees and salaries of officers and employees of the Government have been considered by the various committees on expenditures.

But the Chair would think in this case that either committee really under the wording of the rule would have control. This is a matter for the House to decide. It is a privileged question, and the gentleman from Maryland, who is chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, having agreed with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, moves that it be transferred from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

TUNGSTEN ORES IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4437.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, what is the bill? Will the gentleman indicate? We can not tell what it is merely from the number.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a bill to provide revenue for the Government and promote the production of tungsten ores and the manufacture thereof in the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4437, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4437, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, the rates of duties which are herein prescribed, namely:

First. Crude tungsten, ores, and concentrates, $10 per unit of tungsten trioxide therein contained, a unit being herein defined as 1 per cent of tungstic trioxide in a short ton of 2,000 pounds.

Second. Metallic tungsten, tungsten powder, ferrotungsten (lump and pulverized), ferrotungsten powder, commercial tungstic acid, calcium tungstate, sodium tungstate, and all other salts of tungsten and other manufactured materials containing tungsten, including high-speed tungsten steel, all alloy steels containing tungsten, and all other compounds containing tungsten not specifically provided for in this section, $1 per pound of tungsten contained therein.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to repeal any tariff now existing upon any substances or materials mentioned in this act.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "tungsten" and insert "tungstic"; in line 10 strike out the words "tungstic trioxide in," and at the end of line 2, page 2, after the word "pounds," insert the following: "namely, 20 pounds of tungstic trioxide."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE]. [Applause.]

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret the slight delay in proceeding. I did not know this bill was coming up just at this time, and I desired to furnish some samples here of this metal which I will be glad to have the Members of the House examine. These I think they will find very interesting. Tungsten is a new metal to many people of this country, and very few are fully acquainted with its uses and its production. This mineral was first discovered in this country in the year 1900, in Boulder County, Colo., a county within my congressional district, in consequence of which, prior to my coming here to represent that district, I had considerable information on the subject of tungsten. I recognized at the time that a very important discovery had been made, one that would have a very far-reaching effect upon the industries of this country, both in peace and war time; for, permit me to say, 90 to 95 per cent of this metal is used in the manufacture of high-speed tool steel. Its use in that connection is so important that a tool now hardened by tungstic acid is capable of doing from six to seven times more work than a tool hardened under the old carbon process. Its value during the progress of this war can not be estimated too highly, for without it we could not have accomplished that which we did in the manufacture of ordnance supplies, shells, and so forth, for our own use and that of our allies in the world's greatest war. We hope we may never be called upon to engage in another war, but against a bare possibility we should be prepared. So it can readily be seen when it comes to the preparation for war how necessary it is for this country to have a large supply of tungsten. Its use, however, in peace times should incite to its complete development. The gentleman from New York the other day when the question of a tariff for chemical glassware and porcelain ware was before the committee decried the necessity for this subject being brought up at this time. He went on to state that the Ways and Means Committee of this House had determined to postpone for some time the preparation of a regular tariff bill, proposing to change the terms of the revenue law of 1913 and bring them down to a proper protective basis. I beg leave to differ with my colleague from New York with reference to the necessity of having this item considered before a general plan of the revision of the tariff is taken up, and I want to recount just why that is so.

This industry is at a standstill to-day. Three thousand men employed in it are to-day idle, at least in that industry where their labor would be and is best adapted. This metal is only found in 13 States of this Union. You will see from the copies of the hearings where those are, but the principal deposits are in Boulder County, Colo., and in California and in Nevada. Nevada is a new field, its discovery only being brought about when the great necessity for an increase of this metal developed on account of war activities, and it promises a rich field to-day. In Boulder County it was discovered, as I said, in 1900, and has proceeded gradually, until to-day, in connection with the California field, it has been able to produce from 50 to 60 per cent of all of the tungsten ore that was necessary in all the mechanical uses to which it is applied in this country, the remaining amount, of course, coming from other fields. Just why it is necessary to have this tariff I will endeavor to explain as best I can.

First, I desire to refer briefly to the statement of my friend and colleague on the Democratic side, the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee, in his speech here on the floor of the House the other day, when he referred to the fact, speaking of tungsten, that this bill had been introduced by Mr. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado, and why it had been taken up in preference to other necessary matters was accounted for by him by reason of the fact that "Mr. TIMBERLAKE was a member of the Ways and Means Committee." Permit me to say in this connection that it was not only since I became a member of this great and important committee of the House that I was interested in the subject of tungsten protection. One of my first acts on becoming a Member of this body was to introduce a bill for a tariff on this same tungsten ore, for I had come from a State where it was produced; I saw the importance of the industry, and I saw on account of the cost of production here and the cost of production in the other countries whence it came, if it was to continue and develop as it should develop in this country, that a tariff equal at least to the difference of the cost of production in this country or the countries—China and Burma—with which we must compete was necessary. So that over four years ago I introduced the first bill for a tariff on tungsten.

That bill was not given consideration by the Ways and Means Committee. So, after I became a member of this committee, I reintroduced that bill and urged in every possible way its early consideration.

Let me describe the condition in the little field up in Boulder County. It comprises an area only about 12 miles square, and only about 5,000 to 000 acres of this has been explored or prospected. This ore was first found as a surface ore. It had laid on the top of the ground, and through the action of the ages the dross had been driven from it, and it was found in almost a pure state. In other words, it was found in a 60 per cent concentrate form. A 60 per cent concentrate is a concentrate composed of WO_3. "W" is the symbol for tungsten and "O" for oxygen, at the relative rate of three parts of oxygen to one part of tungsten.

Now, as I said, in an early day this was easily mined. It was surface ore, and from the surface to 5 and 10 feet under the ground was as far as they had to go until a considerable pocket was developed. After that was exhausted it did not take long, in delving further, until they found that under this was a stratum of pure rock with no show of tungsten ore at all, measuring in depth from 200 to 300 feet before even a slight trace of this ore was found.

Now, this [exhibiting] is a sample of tungsten ore from the Boulder field in Colorado, and that shows the width of a vein. In order to get that narrow strip of tungsten, most of the mines there now are down to a depth of from 600 to 1,000 feet. In getting that small piece of ore it was necessary for them to drift a tunnel there wide enough and high enough for them to work in, and they must take out, in order to get that and get the room, some 10 or 15 tons of this ore and the rock that surrounds it in order to get 1 ton of WO_3. Then, instead of finding it in its condensed form it was necessary to take that rock and crush and concentrate it in very expensive mills, so as to reduce it to an ore containing 60 per cent of WO_3, or tungstic trioxide.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Gladly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is the value of this ore as it is taken out of the mine? What is the metallic content worth?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The metallic content is, that in a ton of this ore there are about 15 pounds of tungstic trioxide, which is the valuable part of the ore.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is that worth?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It varies. To-day it is being shipped from China, Burma, and South America and delivered at New York for a price ranging from $6.50 to $7.50 per unit of 20 pounds. I presume those of you who have studied this bill and have read the report which accompanies it, which I hope you have, will know the value is according to the content of tungstic trioxide contained.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Gladly.

Mr. DUNBAR. It says that this ore is worth from $6 to $7 per unit.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Per unit; yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. And, as I understand it, a unit consists of 1 per cent of tungsten to a ton?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir. One per cent of a ton of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. DUNBAR. That would make tungsten worth $6,000 a ton?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. Another question, please. Tungsten is used very largely in the manufacture of all the electric lamps that we have in use?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is one of the very smallest uses to which it is applied; but that is true. All the filaments used in the electric lights are from this metal.

Mr. DUNBAR. How much would this duty imposed increase the cost of an electric lamp?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. So infinitesimally small that you could not compute it. And right here, in connection with that question, to answer the argument that is adduced by those who are opposed to a protective tariff for the reason that it increases the cost to the consumer, I desire to say that the cost to the consumer in the manufactured steel which is made possible by this bill has been estimated to add only 15 cents per ton to the cost of a ton of finished steel; and basing upon that the statement that I made with reference to the cost in the electric-light lamp, it would be almost too infinitesimally small to compute, or at least to affect the cost to the consumer.

This bill asks for a tariff of $10 per unit, a unit being 20 pounds of tungsten trioxide contained in a short ton, so that this tariff would bring a revenue to the Government of $10 per unit of every 20 pounds of tungsten trioxide that is imported into this country.

The necessity for this tariff let me explain. As I showed you, here is a specimen of ferrotungsten in its finished form. I would like you to see it in its condensed form. Here is a specimen of the ferrotungsten made by the Tungsten Product Co., of Boulder, Colo., and that is the form in which it is used in steel manufacture. This sample is the crude product of tungsten ore. In order to reduce this to the shape in which it is used by the steel manufacturers it is converted into this form by heating in electric furnaces, then ground by a very expensive process until it either forms the powder, as shown in this sample, which is tungsten powder, or in crystal form, as shown in this sample, which is ferrotungsten. The larger part of it is used by the steel manufacturers in this crystalline form or in the form of tungsten powder.

This sample is scheelite, another form of tungsten, which is used in the finished product also. This ore was taken from the southern part of Colorado. You can see this part [designating] is tungsten. It is mingled with quartz, and you see the small amount of scheelite that could be gotten from a ton of that character of ore. It is stated in connection with this that it will take 20 tons of this ore to make 1 ton of WO_3. That is found in the southern part of Colorado, but not in very large quantities.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Gladly.

Mr. DUNBAR. This sample that you have shown consists of one part of tungsten and three parts of oxygen?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. This sample?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, what is the value of this as it is now, in that present form?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. To-day it is offered on the New York market, coming from China and Burma, for from $6.50 to $7.50 a unit of 20 pounds.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then, that is worth about $6,000 a ton?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Gladly.

Mr. KINKAID. In what mountain States is tungsten found?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. You will find it stated on a certain page in the hearings, where it is stated that it is found in 13 States of this Union. I can not name all of these.

Mr. KINKAID. Well, do not bother about that.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The principal production is found in Colorado, California, and Nevada; some in Arizona, and some in the Southern States. Arkansas is one of those where it is found in slight quantity.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the prospecting and development so far promise that enough tungsten can be developed in the United States to supply the domestic consumption?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. With the known fields, it is estimated that we can to-day produce from 50 to 60 per cent of all the tungsten used in this country, and we feel that with this encouragement, which will aid in the development and seeking out of new fields, it will require only a short time until this country, by reason of the discovery and developments that have been made, will become independent of these other resources for tungsten.

Mr. KINKAID. I have not examined the bill carefully. It does not fix any limit of time, does it?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Well, it was suggested in the hearing by some of the witnesses that in their judgment this would stimulate exploration and development to such an extent they thought in three years' time we would be able to supply our full demand.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Gladly.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows if any of this foreign product is owned and capitalized by American capital?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Permit me to say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Washington, that it was developed at the hearing that there was one case where that was true. Mr. Hepburn, of Pennsylvania, appeared before the committee and advised us that his sons for several years past had been interested in tungsten mines in South America, and he opposed, in a way as least, this rate of tariff, although I have a letter from him which I think makes his position entirely clear. He thinks that American capital having money invested in those countries should receive some consideration, and yet when he was interrogated with reference to whether or not, in his judgment, this tariff was necessary in order properly to develop the industry in this country he answered that it was. I will just read his letter. He says:

Mr. Calbreath and Mr. Lawrie both being out when I called, I saw Mr. Burns, who suggested that I give you the inclosed papers.

The inclosed papers contained quite an argument why there should be some difference with reference to the protection that we were asking against Chinese and Burmese ore from that which applied against South American ore. He says further:

One thing more I wish to add, to wit: That we believe in a tariff on tungsten that will enable our home mines to be worked profitably, and that will preclude the importation of cheap Asiatic ores, even if it prevents entirely the shipments from American-citizen-operated mines in South America to our own country, rather than no tariff at all.

That is signed by Mr. R. H. Hepburn. I consider that a very magnanimous statement from Mr. Hepburn.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. It would seem, then, that this metal, where it is produced outside of the United States, is undoubtedly produced in countries where labor is very cheap?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is true, and just here I might as well mention that fact in connection with my argument for this bill. The reason that this rate of tariff is necessary is on account of the difference in labor conditions here and in those countries that are competing with us.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ASWELL. What proportion of the tungsten is produced in foreign countries?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I just stated a few moments ago that we produce from 50 to 60 per cent. The gentleman's question is, How much is produced in foreign countries?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; I mean what proportion of the consumption in this country is produced in foreign countries? We really produce about two-thirds in this country, do we not?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes; but the other third we are importing.

Mr. ASWELL. How much will this proposed duty increase the price to consumers in this country?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I just made the statement a while ago. In computing the cost to the consumer, it is so infinitesimally small that there has been no opposition to the provisions of this bill from the manufacturers of steel or from any other source.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman really believe this high rate proposed is necessary?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I absolutely believe that for the stabilizing of this industry in this country and for its development up to its possibilities it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. ASWELL. Really there is not much danger of any foreign competition, is there, to amount to anything?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Oh, very decidedly. Therein lies the danger.

Mr. ASWELL. From what country?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. From China.

Mr. ASWELL. It does not amount to very much, though, compared to what we have in this country?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Oh, China produces a great deal more than we do in this country.

Mr. ASWELL. I mean we do not consume very much from China.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. We consumed from 45 to 50 per cent from foreign imports under the rate of production here before the armistice was signed. Since then none is produced.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. KINKAID. Were the importations into the United States from foreign countries greatly reduced during the war or not?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will say to the gentleman that they were not greatly reduced. Although the industry was given every encouragement to further development, they were not able to produce all that was necessary in this country by about 30 per cent.

Mr. KINKAID. Were the prices increased somewhat during the war?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The prices were materially increased during the war.

Mr. KINKAID. How much? What was the cost of production?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I can not give exact prices. The cost of production in the Boulder field has been demonstrated to be from $15 to $20 per unit, and the cost of production in the Burma field is very much less than ours, on account of labor being paid from 20 to 50 cents a day in Burma, against the $5 a day paid to our laborers. In Burma they work 10½ to 12 hours a day, as against our 8 hours a day in this country. Then, in addition to that, in the Chinese field, on account of the fact that the ore is on the surface and can be gouged out with pick and shovel, and gathered up in baskets and taken to market, the women and children are engaged in the industry. In the early days of the industry in this country the ore was on the surface, but now it is found only in the form which I have indicated here by the samples which I have on the table, the width of the vein being shown by the piece of ore which I hold in my hand. They are having to go to a depth of from 300 to 1,000 feet in order to get it, and in getting it out they must take out 5 or 6 tons of rock in order to get this small amount.

Mr. KINKAID. I am in thorough sympathy with the gentleman on the labor phases of the question, and I think the measure deserves support on that proposition; but the further inquiry I wish to make is this, whether it was due to the increased price of tungsten caused by the war that these discoveries and developments could be made in the United States and were made?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The war stimulated the production to a considerable extent.

Mr. KINKAID. And allowed operation at a profit on a war basis?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes; and they extended their explorations to a considerable extent.

Mr. KINKAID. But now that the war is over they need protection in order that they may continue, on account of prospective lower prices.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is correct. The day that the armistice was signed tungstic ore dropped on the New York market from $20 to $26 a unit, which it was bringing before the armistice was signed, to $7.50 and $8 a unit, in consequence of which decline every mine in this country is closed down. In the Boulder field, which I know more about personally, the people are patriotic. There are about 1,500 people employed in this industry there, in this area of 12 square miles. Several growing communities have been built up. The miners who are accustomed to this work have built their homes there. When we declared war there were 700 gallant young miners in this field who volunteered to serve their country and they entered the Army. To-day they are returning home. Their families were left there. They find their employment gone. They have been used to this kind of work. It is hard for them to get similar employment elsewhere, and their homes are there. To-day, however, they are drifting off hunting for work. These thrifty towns are almost abandoned. That is why I have pointed out the necessity for immediate action by this House.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is the foreign product shipped here in a reduced form such as my colleague shows in that highly concentrated form?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It is. There is no tariff to-day on this ore. There is a 15 per cent ad valorem duty in the Underwood bill on the tungstic trioxide, on the finished product.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In specific gravity, how does that compare with gold or lead?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I can not answer that question. I do not recall the specific gravity. It is very heavy. It is heavier, it seems to me, than lead.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. In just a moment. I had yielded to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I had simply asked in what form the finished product comes here.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I had answered that it comes in the concentrated form. There is no duty on the ore at all. It has to be concentrated, and very extensive machinery is used in that process.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Do they ship the ore here from China?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. No; the ore is not shipped here. It never comes in, except as WO_3, on which there is a duty of only 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The other question I asked in respect to specific gravity was asked merely out of curiosity.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman, I presume, is familiar with the importation into this country of Mexican graphite. I have understood that there are large quantities of Mexican graphite being produced in Mexico through the instrumentality of American capital, and that they object very greatly to a tariff on Mexican graphite.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. In answer to the gentleman, I beg to say that I do know that there are very valuable deposits of graphite, and that is another very necessary war mineral. Its development should be encouraged in this country. While I know there is considerable American capital invested in Mexico in the graphite mines, I also know that there is a very large amount of American capital invested in graphite mines in our own country. In Colorado and in Alabama there are very great deposits, and I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has introduced a bill for a duty on graphite. I sincerely hope that it will receive the serious consideration of this House, because I believe it is necessary to develop that industry in this country on account of its great value as a war mineral and on account of its use in industrial branches.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the gentleman's judgment as to the propriety of the policy of putting a tariff on graphite coming into this country from Mexican mines owned by Americans?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. While I would sympathize with parties here having capital invested in a foreign country, it would not deter me from supporting a tariff sufficiently large to develop that industry in this country. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. In the first subdivision of the bill there is provision for a duty of $10 per unit on tungstic trioxide, and that makes a duty on the tungsten contained in the ore of $600 a ton.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is correct—that is, on a 60 per cent concentrate.

Mr. KITCHIN. On 60 per cent of pure tungsten in a ton of ore. The 60 per cent would be 1,200 pounds.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. And there are 60 units in that?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. A great many Members have asked me what it means.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. In the second subdivision of the bill a duty is provided on metallic tungsten, and so forth, of $1 per pound of tungsten. That would be, of pure tungsten metal, at the rate of $2,000 per ton.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir. That is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My colleague has spoken of this as a war metal. Is it not true that tungsten is becoming tremendously important in hundreds of uses and is already a great domestic necessity throughout this country at this time, regardless of war?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will say to my colleague that that is true. Those of you who have read the hearings will probably note that fact very forcefully stated.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not also true that the mining and production of tungsten being such a comparatively new industry in this country, having been discovered and established only a very few years, and being a bona fide infant industry, capable of marvelous development, it is the gentleman's idea that this duty or tariff will tend to so build up, encourage, and stabilize the industry that it may possibly some day put it on a self-supporting basis, where we can produce it in competition with other countries without any tariff protection?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I think that is true, and I think anyone who thinks of the necessity for this tungsten, in case we should have trouble in the future, must realize the importance of it. In case of trouble, if we did not develop our own tungsten mines, we might not be able to get it from abroad. Suppose we should have trouble with Japan or England, we might not be able to get it. There is great necessity for its use in the manufacture of steel for domestic purposes in this country, and it is vitally necessary that this country have it in plentiful quantities in case of war.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not also true that the gentleman's constituents in Boulder County, Colo., and whom I had the honor to represent in Congress for six years, and who represent one of the greatest and most important tungsten developments in this country, desire only such protection as will honestly afford them a fair and reasonable opportunity to develop and permanently establish this tungsten industry, which has such wonderful possibilities for our country in the future?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is absolutely true.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They are not trying to build a high, monopolistic tariff wall around the United States to the injury of the people?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Not by any means. In this connection permit me to say that I had a talk the other day with an American who is interested in South American tungsten ore, and he made the statement that with a duty of $10 per unit on the South American product he could go into his mine in South America and produce tungsten and deliver it in this country and make all kinds of money and pay that tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not also true that notwithstanding the tariff was taken off of tungsten before the war, and there was no duty on it during the war, and tungsten mining was in a precarious condition, yet at the instance of the administration the mine owners of these tungsten mines patriotically responded and went in and did a tremendous amount of work and spent large amounts of money and produced the tungsten as a patriotic duty for the purpose of furnishing what was absolutely necessary to the successful carrying on of the war and rendered a great service to our country?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is true, and in addition I want to say that they are not so favorably considered as are the producers of other metals that were deemed necessary by the departments of this Government, and for which we appropriated eight and one-half million dollars, to take care of those who had gone on at the urgent instance of the departments to develop their mines and increase their production.

Acting upon that, not waiting for command from some department, these same men borrowed money to put into a prospect hole in order to increase the production of tungsten here in this country, only to find now from this appropriation they are not receiving any consideration at all. Why? Because of the fact that they did not have a written contract with any board that authorized them to go on. I submit to you gentlemen that all of these reports went out to the country from the departments urging them to increase their production along all lines. They did not believe it would be necessary for them to have a specific order. They received that order just as they received the order for the draft, through the press of the country. They did not get personal notice.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman believe even though they did do it that that should have anything to do with this bill? Every other industry in this whole country and every individual did the same thing. It is no credit to them especially. If they did not do it, they should have been kicked out of the country.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Not to the extent of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing the industry——

Mr. ASWELL. Oh, various enterprises of this country did it where every dollar was lost.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. They ought to be reimbursed if they did that at the suggestion and invitation of their Government only to find they were losing by the process.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman further think that the element of protection to American labor also figures in this?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It certainly does. America does not want to see its labor degenerate to the condition of the Chinese miner, to live under the conditions the Chinese live. There is not a Member of this House who would stand for our labor degenerating in that way. And permit me to say in this connection that that is not all that adds to the cost of production in this country. As I have shown you, this deposit in China is a surface deposit, it is easily gathered, there is no expensive machinery used in its concentration. Why, there are millions and millions of dollars here in this country in the Boulder field, the California and Nevada field, on these concentrating mills which require complex and costly machinery in order to concentrate this metal. Now that enters into it. Then you can see what it would mean through these Rocky Mountains to dig a trench 2½ feet wide, 7 feet high, right through granite rock and then only find a strip of ore of that kind to repay them. So the cost of labor in performing that work is very high priced. Those of you who have read the hearings will notice that no one has appeared in opposition to a tariff on tungsten.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. RAKER. What effect would the proposed legislation have upon the approximately 5,000 tons of ore now in storage in and about New York? Would they get this raise in the tariff?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Would they get the benefit of this rate of tariff?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I am not able to answer that question with reference to this received in bond. I presume it would not be subject to this tariff, and only that which came in after this bill, if it passes, becomes operative, would be subject to the tariff.

Mr. RAKER. These people imported this tungsten ore, as I understand, to the extent of about 5,000 tons, and that is on deposit now in and about New York. Now, what effect will the placing of this tariff upon that ore have upon the price—will it raise it about 100 per cent, giving these people an enormous profit?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Well, I am not able to answer that question definitely. I am rather of the opinion that the provisions of this bill could not apply to the product that had already been bonded in this country coming from abroad. I would not like to put that answer in as definite, because I am not thoroughly conversant with it.

Mr. RAKER. Then they would get the benefit of the tariff now imposed without being compelled to pay any tariff upon that which they had shipped and had stored pending legislation?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I think that would be true. The gentleman from California is more or less acquainted, I presume, with the industry in this country, having either in his district or adjoining his district the Atolia mine, which is one of the largest commercial producers of tungsten. Now, gentlemen, I made a statement I want to correct just in a slight way. I made the statement at the beginning that there was not a tungsten mine in operation in this country to-day, and had not been within a few days after the armistice was signed. That was not strictly correct, because I have lately had the information that the Atolia mine is running a very small shift, which is necessary for the reason that before the armistice was signed they had entered into a contract with the owners of that mine for continuous operation for a certain time, and while they are losing money every day they operate, hoping for protection that will relieve them; they have continued to work a very small shift there in order to comply with their contract, although, as I say, they are losing money every day they operate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE, Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, through the courtesy of the gentleman controlling the time, I simply wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the possible cause of race riots.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the possible cause of race riots. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the high rate of duty imposed by this bill and shall vote against it if it is retained. Much is being said and much being done to reduce the high cost of living, but gentlemen of the majority party seem determined to increase the cost to the consumer of everything they touch. Unless the rate is reduced, I shall certainly oppose the bill.

But at this time I wish to expose a conspiracy, culminating on the 11th of this month, to raise the prices of a very necessary food. I propose to present this data, and all other I can secure, to the Department of Justice, and hope the conspirators will land in prison, where they justly belong. I wish to have read from the Clerk's desk two letters, one from the conspirators to their representatives and agents throughout the entire country, the other from a patriotic citizen of my State, who very vigorously and properly protests against this outrageous combination which strikes at the very life of our people, as beans are one of the most widely used and necessary foods.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Circular No. 107.]

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 2, 1919.

GENTLEMEN: We are finding ourselves in a peculiar position. You probably know that there is in contemplation a merger of the three largest lima-bean shippers on the coast for the next five years, namely, the association, the Levy Co., and the Waterman Selling Agency.

Now, if this thing goes through, and we will not know until August 11, the three of us will all have to sell upon the same terms, conditions, and at same prices.

You know we told our agents to send us S. A. P. business, and we are told that the association and Levy did the same. They, however, took S. A. P.'s subject to their confirmation after buyer approved, while we failed to put this clause up to you when soliciting the jobbers. In consequence, a peculiar thing happened. Our brokers sent more orders for September shipment than could possibly be harvested during September even at a normal crop, and now we know we have only a 50 to 65 per cent crop.

In order to prevent ourselves from being swamped it would be necessary to name a ridiculously high price for September shipment, which no jobber could possibly approve of. We are sure you will agree with us that that would be foolish and disastrous for all concerned.

We are going on the presumption that this combination is going to be put into operation, and we are now putting before you the plan which we believe is the only way to handle this and do it so that justice is done to every one of our friends and customers, and remember that no one is able to judge unless he first becomes acquainted with all the conditions surrounding this combination of selling agents.

Therefore, see all jobbers who gave you S. A. P.'s, explain the situation, cancel S. A. P.'s previously given or get them to change as follows: Let each one give you his positive orders for each month at whatever price will be named, and let them state that they give us authority to purchase this quantity for them, at the same time agreeing to accept pro rata delivery. They must appreciate that the crop is short and limas are a good purchase. We really don't know where they could place their orders and be assured of better treatment than we can give them.

The above is not only for limas but also for baby limas, which will probably sell for less, and we have an idea they will become more popular, so be sure to cover the two kinds of limas, both being good sellers. We will have a definite amount to sell each month during the harvest, and, of course, not more than can be shipped out, and it will do the jobbers no good to place orders with more than one selling agency, as a complete record will be kept and comparisons made so each one will get his just pro rata.

Some jobbers may think we are asking too much by wanting open orders, but we know we can then guard their interests much better this season. We should have their orders to book at whatever price is named and then be allowed to prorate, and at the proper time wire your quantities confirmed.

Get to work immediately, finish in time to have everything completed, all records in the mail Saturday, August 9; and remember as long as they allow us to prorate—and we must be able to do that—we are willing to book all the business we can.

Don't forget that no brokers can book orders for themselves; they must be booked in bona fide jobbers' names according to blue book. We have been told no arguments will prevail against this decision and no jobbers or brokers who are speculators can book orders.

Get to work with a will and the determination that, notwithstanding there won't be big quantities, to make this the most profitable year in limas and baby limas for all concerned.

Yours, truly,

J. M. WATERMAN,
Selling Agency.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that this is a corner in the market on beans and has been definitely planned. This is criminal conduct in a time like this, or in any other time. The above letter has been sent to their agents to have the merchants of the country order beans in the open market without naming the price, giving this combination the right to fix the price after the month ends. If that is not a conspiracy against one of the most important articles of food, I do not know where to find one. And I present this in order to expose the conspiracy, and I shall carry it straight from this House to the Department of Justice.

The other letter which I print gives clearly the purpose of the conspiracy to hold up the public in a scheme of indefensible profiteering. I hope through the Department of Justice the guilty ones will promptly land in jail and there have many years to repent.

ALEXANDRIA, LA., August 7, 1919.

Hon. JAMES B. ASWELL,
Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: I am inclosing you a copy of a circular letter issued by J. M. Waterman Selling Agency, dated at Los Angeles, Calif., August 2. This letter is addressed to their brokers throughout the country.

You will note that they with two other dealers are contemplating a merger for the purpose of controlling the bean crops. From the tenor of the circular, you will note it is their purpose to cancel all (S. A. P.) subject-to-approval-price contracts that were made and offer in lieu of the subject-to-approval price a contract that means we would have to give a positive order for beans to be shipped each month and at whatever price they see fit to name, giving them authority to purchase the beans and at the same time agreeing to accept pro rata delivery.

You can readily see that this would have the effect only of putting the price of this staple food commodity out of reach of the ordinary consumer. They could easily go on the market and contract for more beans than are raised, and by having entire control put the price at whatever point they wanted.

The canners of California fruit offer us practically the same contract on fruits, and many other packers of foods are doing the same thing. Many of the jobbers are refusing to sign any such contracts, we among the number. The result will be we will have no goods to sell.

Now, the purport of this letter is not to suggest to you gentlemen the course to pursue, because you are on the ground and doubtless have studied the situation better possibly than I, but I wanted you to see just what is being offered to us. I candidly believe that unless some drastic legislation is passed to control the food profiteering this country will be disturbed all over by riots and insurrections. Beans are the poor man's food, or, it might better be said, the masses' food.

Other large meat packers have taken charge of the rice, as by statistics it can be shown that in 1917, when Mr. Armour entered the rice field as a dealer, he not only became the largest rice merchant in the world, handling 17,000,000 pounds, but that it resulted in rice advancing 65 per cent. Now, this was very nice for the rice growers, but it really created a fictitious price to the consumer, who was not fortunate enough to live in the rice-growing belt. Mr. Armour's branch house in Alexandria brought in several cars of rice at a cheap price, and could have by their immense purchasing power offered rice very much cheaper than the wholesale grocer, but it was only a short time that the stocks owned by the wholesale grocer (in accordance with the food regulations) were sold out at a low price, and Mr. Armour succeeded in getting a high price for his stock.

I firmly believe that the five packers—Armour, Swift, Cudahy, Morris, and Wilson—started out with the deliberate purpose of controlling the entire staple-food products in this country. I notice from reports that they have thousands of pounds of butter, thousands of pounds of frozen meat and fish, and thousands of cases of eggs now in cold storage, being held off the market, and have it to offer just as the packer wants, and at his own price.

We have raised wages in this country almost to the breaking point, but even with the wages raised, the laboring man is no better off, and has probably fewer luxuries than he did under a smaller wage scale and cheaper living expenses. This high cost applies as well to dry goods and shoes as it does to groceries. There is profiteering going on all over the country, and unless some drastic step is taken to stop the profiteering it means trouble to all of us.

I hope you will pardon me for this letter. I know you will use your good judgment and favor such bills as will bring relief.

Yours, very truly,

B. F. THOMPSON.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has the gentleman presented this to the Department of Justice?

Mr. ASWELL. I am doing it to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon has 14 minutes remaining of his time, and the gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, our attention has been called to the very serious problem of the high cost of living, and suggestions of amendments to existing laws have been made, and it occurs to me that it may be interesting to the membership of the House and to the country if I call attention to provisions of existing law, law that has been in force since August 10, 1917. The food-control act was approved on August 10, 1917, and if the committee will bear with me I will read some of its provisions at some length.

Section 1 states the purpose of the law—to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement, of foods, feeds, fuel (including fuel oil and natural gas), and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. * * * The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

It will be remembered that the President, in his message of August 8 instant, suggested amendment of the act so as to include "feedstuffs, fuel, clothing, and many other commodities which are indisputably necessaries of life." It will be noticed that the section I have quoted includes feedstuffs and fuel.

Section 2 of the act provides:

That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized * * * to create and use any agency or agencies, * * * to cooperate with any agency or person, to utilize any department or agency of the Government, and to coordinate their activities.

By virtue of this authority the President created several agencies, including the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration, and made use of some existing departments of the Government, including the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice.

I wish to quote section 4 in full:

That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries; or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

It will be noticed that this is the section which the President says is "accompanied by no penalty," and he suggests that "a penalty should be provided which will be persuasive." It is true this section does not in so many words provide a penalty, but I shall later call your attention to the fact that other sections of the act and the act as a whole do provide a penalty or furnish a way by which compliance with the provisions of section 4 can be enforced and its violation punished.

Section 5 is a very important section. It relates to the issuing of licenses. It provides—

That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The section excludes from its provisions farmers, gardeners, and other producers of food products as to any of these products produced on land owned, leased, or cultivated by them. The section also defines a retailer "to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaged in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum."

Section 6 is the "hoarding section," and is as follows:

That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded, within the meaning of this act, when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirements for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time; (b) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price.

The section does not relate to transactions on any exchange, board of trade, and so forth, because these are taken care of in another section, nor does it relate to farmers, gardeners, or others who produce necessaries on land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

Section 7 of the act provides that necessaries that shall be hoarded may be seized, condemned, and sold, the intention being to impose a penalty or to provide a remedy against the necessaries themselves that have been hoarded, as other sections provide for the apprehension and punishment of hoarders themselves. I quote a portion of it, so that you may see how full and how strong it is:

That whenever any necessaries shall be hoarded as defined in section 6, they shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same are found and seized by a process of libel for condemnation; and if such necessaries shall be adjudged to be hoarded they shall be disposed of by sale in such manner as to provide the most equitable distribution thereof, as the court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid to the party entitled thereto.

Section 8 forbids and provides punishment for destruction of necessaries:

That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Section 9 is intended to prevent conspiracies and combinations:

That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Section 11 confers the broad authority upon the President to purchase certain food products and to sell them at reasonable prices:

That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes.

And the only limitation as to prices at which these food products shall be sold is the provision contained in section 14, by which the minimum guaranteed price of wheat is fixed at $2; the sale of wheat can not be made below this minimum price. This is a very broad provision, conferring, as it does, authority on the President to direct his agents to go into the market and buy food products and to resell them to the people at cost. This authority was evidently given for the purpose of enabling the President to control prices—to protect the people against profiteers.

There is a section for the control of exchanges and boards of trade and for the prevention of injurious speculation or unjust manipulation of prices of necessaries. It is section 13, a portion of which I quote:

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or party prohibit operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices.

And this section provides that violation of regulations made by the President shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding four years, or both.

Money was appropriated by section 18 to be available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. The sum of $2,500,000 was appropriated "for the payment of such rent, the expense, including postage, of such printing and publications, the purchase of such material and equipment, and the employment of such persons and means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential."

And by section 19 the sum of $150,000,000 was appropriated and made available during the time the act is in effect. This money was available for use by the President, his agent or agents, in carrying out the purposes of the act, the only limitation on its use being "that no part of it shall be expended for the purposes described in the preceding section (18)."

My purpose in quoting the sections of this law so fully is that the House may know how well the Congress enacting the law did its work, how full and evidently complete the act is, so that the House, and the country as well, may judge whether amendments are necessary and whether or not the agencies created by the President have used, as they should have used, the authority conferred upon them by Congress in dealing with the serious problem of the high cost of living.

I wish to call attention particularly to section 5, which authorizes the President to issue licenses to persons, companies, or corporations engaged in the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries. This section gives the President authority to determine when and in what cases licenses shall be necessary, and, announcement of the President having been made, it is made unlawful for anyone to engage in or carry on business specified in the announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license; that when the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory or unfair or wasteful, the licensee must discontinue improper or objectionable business methods; that the President may determine what is just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and it shall be the duty of the licensee to comply with and to conform to the President's finding in this respect; that the penalty for engaging in business without a license or for failing to discontinue unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, or unfair charge, commission, profit, or practice, as determined by the President, makes the licensee liable to punishment by a fine of $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. And it may be observed that a retailer—that is, one whose business does not exceed $100,000 per annum—is not required to secure a license. These licenses cover all kinds of business and dealings in all food products and necessaries enumerated in the act, and I wish to submit that if the power conferred by this section had been exercised there would have been and might have continued to this day a complete control over all business in foodstuffs and other necessaries, and control over everybody engaged in such business from the large dealer down to the very smallest.

You may ask how the retailers whose business does not reach $100,000 per year were to be reached, inasmuch as they have been expressly exempted by the statute. They were reached by imposing upon the licensee, the large dealer, by the express terms and conditions of his license, the duty of seeing to it that no small dealer whom he supplied with goods for retail trade sold them or in any manner carried on his business respecting them in an unfair, unreasonable, or unjust way, that no unreasonable price was asked, and that no unreasonable profit was gained by the retail dealer—a very effective method, found to be effective in the few cases in which it was tried. So that the act does give entire control over the entire proposition of manufacture, distribution, and sale of foodstuffs by business large and small alike.

It was pointed out to us that the act relating to destroying necessaries and the committing of waste and the hoarding and the attempt to monopolize, the attempt to get too large a profit, carries no penalty. Violation of these provisions can be punished and prevented, because those who are guilty of these unlawful acts are reached under the licensing system, and some of these unlawful acts have been punished and others have been prevented by proceeding under the licensing section against those who were guilty of them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that some gentlemen appeared before your committee, representing the Department of Justice, with regard to this matter of penalty for profiteering, and stated that after further consideration of the matter they concluded there was a penalty in the law, notwithstanding the fact that the President had suggested that there was a lack of penalty against profiteering.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That question was asked of one of the legal representatives of the Department of Agriculture, and he made answer practically as the gentleman from Wyoming states. But he said later that the matter under section 4 could be reached through the licensing system and not by the imposition of a direct penalty.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the things prohibited by section 4 could be prohibited as a condition in the license, and violation of a condition of a license could, of course, be prosecuted under the act?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes. I thought I had made that clear, that all these things could be provided against in the license issued to the manufacturer, distributor, or large dealer, and the only doubt that could arise in anyone's mind as to the extent to which the matter could be reached under the licensing system was as to the retailers, those whose business did not reach $100,000 a year. I endeavored to point out that even those were reached, because the license issued to the large dealer might contain, and some licenses did contain, the provision that the large dealer should carry on his business in such a way that the small dealer could not get goods if the small dealer did anything violative of the provisions or contrary to the spirit of this section 4.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Under the statement of the gentleman, then, you do not think it is necessary to amend this food-control act in the particular as to inserting a penalty, as suggested by the Department of Justice?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think it is not necessary to amend it by inserting a penalty, although I am disclosing no committee secret when I say that the Committee on Agriculture, having had under consideration two amendments recommended by the Attorney General, involving the inclusion of certain words suggested by the President and the affixing of a penalty to section 4, has approved of those two amendments, and a bill will very shortly be introduced carrying those amendments.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. If I understood the gentleman correctly, the law provides that the license shall be issued by such agency as the President shall designate?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. And the President has the authority to make such rules and regulations with reference to the issuing of those licenses as he deems prudent?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. RICKETTS. And no such agencies have been established under this law. Is that true?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Some agencies were established. The Food Administration and the Fuel Administration were agencies, and the President called into being other agencies and set to work other authorities, I may say, for a time, and many licenses were issued. But concerning important lines of business the licenses were withdrawn and canceled by the action of the President on the 11th day of February of this year.

Mr. RICKETTS. This year?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; 1919. On February 11, 1919, the President issued the following proclamation:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the powers conferred upon me by said act of Congress, hereby find and determine and by this proclamation do announce that it is no longer essential in order to carry into effect the purposes of the act that the importation, manufacture, storage, or distribution of certain necessaries be subject to license to the extent hereinafter specified.

Licenses heretofore required for the importation, manufacture, storage, or distribution of certain necessaries are hereby canceled, effective February 22, 1919, with respect to the following:

All persons, firms, corporations, or associations engaged in the business of importation, manufacturing, or distributing butter or eggs, or engaged in the business of operating cold-storage warehouses.

All regulations issued under the said act covering licensees so dealing in these commodities are hereby canceled, effective February 22, 1919.

This proclamation shall in no way affect licenses heretofore required for the importation, manufacture, storage, or distribution of necessaries or regulations governing licensees, other than as indicated above.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the city of Paris, France, this 11th day of February, in the year of the Lord 1919, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-third.

[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.

By the President.

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

So the President in his wisdom removed all restrictions and gave up all attempt to control, as he had absolute power to control, all business in butter and eggs, and all business carried on by cold-storage warehousemen; and it should be stated that cold-storage warehouses store and deal in meats of all kinds, except salted and pickled meats; fish, poultry, butter, cheese, eggs, and lard. So the President deliberately, in February of this year, gave up the control that he had theretofore exercised over all these products.

It was said in another body yesterday in debate that prosecutions under this act have not been successful because the act had been imperfectly drawn, and one of the imperfections pointed out was that the act does not include corporations; that it refers only to persons, and it was said that this omission made it impossible to regulate in any manner or to prosecute corporations. The gentleman who made that statement is not familiar with the act, because there is a section—section 23—which says:

The word "person," whenever used in this act, shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act the act, omission, or failure of any official, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office shall, in every case, also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such partnership, association, or corporation as well as that of the person.

It will be seen, therefore, that the section is as broad and inclusive as it is possible to make it; that it is in the form used in other acts of Congress intended to reach corporations.

It has been claimed, too, that the administration has not been proceeding in the work of reducing or preventing the high cost of living, and that there are now no arrests or prosecutions because of the failure of Congress to make proper appropriations of money. Those who offer that explanation or apology have forgotten or fail to mention the fact that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, there was appropriated for the Food Administration $7,500,000 and for the Fuel Administration $3,500,000. So little was done under that act by way of controlling the food business and trying to curb the high cost of living that at the close of the fiscal year ending six weeks ago the administration turned back $3,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And no further appropriation for this year was asked for by anybody for the purpose of carrying out this act.

Mr. RICKETTS. Who turned back the $3,500,000? Who had charge of that?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The enforcement of this law was in the hands of the President of the United States, authorized to use any agency or agencies he might be pleased to create, and among other things he created the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration. The appropriation of $7,500,000 was for the President's use in carrying on under the Food Administration the control of food and other necessaries enumerated in the act, and the $3,500,000 was for his use in carrying on the control of fuel under the Fuel Administration.

Mr. RICKETTS. Was the $3,500,000 turned back by the President?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know whether you would say by the President—by this administration.

Mr. RICKETTS. The President or his agents.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No one connected with this administration, not even the Department of Justice, asked for any additional money or any further appropriation to continue this work or any part of it.

It seems that the Secretary of Agriculture was early asked to enforce the provisions regarding the "manufacture, distribution, sale, and prices of fertilizer, fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of food, feeds, and fuel"; but we learned that absolutely nothing has been done by the Secretary of Agriculture in the way of exercising that authority. One of his officials said very recently that the Secretary, knowing that he had this authority and that the duty of enforcing this law was upon him, was "following up that proposition." This law has been in force nearly two years, and the Secretary of Agriculture is "following it up." The interesting thing about it is that he is still "following," and he gives no intimation that he will ever catch up.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Watchful waiting.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. My time is very limited.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. He did handle the fertilizer business, at least.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. He handled some nitrate fertilizer, yes, and sold it at $80 a ton; but nothing has been done or attempted in the direction of reducing the enormous prices paid by farmers for "tools, utensils, implements, machinery, or equipment" mentioned in section 1. Now, I have intended by my remarks to show that the food-control act conferred ample authority upon the administration to do everything which the administration gives evidence now of wishing to do, and that little or nothing has been done. The morning paper carries a notice of the conviction of a man at Binghamton, N. Y., and the Attorney General says "it is the first of the Federal convictions for profiteering that has been had." District Attorney Lucey telegraphed from Binghamton, N. Y., that a retail grocer had been fined $500 for selling sugar at 15 cents a pound. No details were given, and it is not known here under which section of the law the case was brought. Mr. Palmer says that "a few good convictions for profiteering in each State will settle the trouble." So they have finally found that there is a law under which they can reach profiteers, even retailers, and they are proceeding, after the lapse of nearly two years. I did not rise for the purpose of taking issue with those who have asked amendments to the law. I have merely spoken for the purpose of showing what the law is, and that, in my judgment and the judgment of those who have had directly to do with it on the committee, that the law is and has been since its enactment ample for every purpose to enable the administration to do what it seems to wish to do now, except that clothing might be included, and that containers of food might be included, and that, perhaps, in order to make it a little more certain and easy of execution, a penalty should be attached to and provided for the violation of the things set forth in section 4. [Applause].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS], although a member of the Railroad Brotherhood of Engineers, and notwithstanding the fact that he has been chairman of the brotherhood committee having in charge the wage question for such brotherhood, was unable, upon the request of certain Members here, to give us very definite information concerning the wages received by engineers and trainmen. I have just received by special messenger from the Railroad Administration a letter bearing on this subject dated to-day, August 14, which gives us more specific information. It does not give the figures existing since the last raise, but this statement shows that prior to the last raise the average monthly earnings for passenger conductors in 1918 was $190.50; for freight conductors, $188.75; for passenger engineers, $211.42; and for freight engineers, $207.50. It gives the figures for 1916 and 1917 also. It states that there are no figures yet available showing the data with reference to the average earnings subsequent to the placing in effect of the wages as referred to in Supplements No. 15 and No. 16, same being contained in the Director General's press notice of April 11.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman state what the difference is?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. There has been some question whether or not these employees are paid for overtime. That question was raised here on the floor of the House. In reply I will read from Supplement No. 16 to General Order No. 27 of the United States Railroad Administration:

ARTICLE II.—Basic day.

One hundred miles or less (straightaway or turnaround), five hours or less, except as provided in Article III, section (a), shall constitute a day's work, miles in excess of 100 will be paid for at the mileage rate provided, according to class of engine.

ARTICLE III.—Overtime.

(a) Engineers, firemen, and helpers on short turn-around passenger runs, no single trip of which exceeds 80 miles, including suburban and branch-line service, shall be paid overtime for all time actually on duty, or held for duty, in excess of 8 hours (computed on each run from the time required to report for duty to the end of that run) within 10 consecutive hours; and also for all time in excess of 10 consecutive hours computed continuously from the time first required to report to the final release at the end of the last run. Time shall be counted as continuous service in all cases where the interval of release from duty at any point does not exceed one hour. This rule applies regardless of mileage made.

For calculating overtime under this rule the management may designate the initial trip.

(b) Engineers, firemen, and helpers on other passenger runs shall be paid overtime on a speed basis of 20 miles per hour computed continuously from the time required to report for duty until released at the end of the last run. Overtime shall be computed on the basis of actual overtime worked or held for duty, except that when the minimum day is paid for the service performed, overtime shall not accrue until the expiration of five hours from the time of first reporting for duty.

Where a more favorable overtime rule exists, such rule may be retained, in which event this section will not apply.

Where the provisions of this section for continuous time on turnaround runs of over 80 miles one way, change existing overtime rules, the effective date will be April 10, 1919; otherwise January 1, 1919.

(c) Overtime in all passenger service shall be paid for on the minute basis at a rate per hour of not less than one-eighth of the daily rate herein provided, according to class of engine.

Showing conclusively that they do get paid for overtime.

The letter to which I refer is as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS,
Washington, August 14, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our telephone conversation this morning with reference to figures of overtime and pay of enginemen and trainmen:

I attach hereto copy of Supplements No. 15 and No. 16 to General Order No. 27, which supplements prescribe rates of pay and the rules for terminal time and working conditions of enginemen and trainmen. You will find under Article III of Supplement No. 16 a definition of overtime.

I do not find that we have available figures showing maximum pay of men in train service, but give you the following, which shows the average compensation for the years 1916, 1917, and 1918 for the classes of employees you spoke of:

	Average monthly earnings
	1916	1917	1918
Freight engineers	$154.32	$175.64	$207.50
Passenger engineers	177.04	185.93	211.42
Freight conductors	134.77	154.66	188.75
Passenger conductors	156.41	163.75	190.50

The figures are based on reports of the railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission and are arrived at by taking the actual average compensation as so reported and dividing by 12.

There are no figures yet available showing the data with reference to the average earnings subsequent to the placing in effect of the wages as referred to in Supplements No. 15 and No. 16, attached hereto. In that connection, I invite your attention to the Director General's press notice of April 11.

Yours, very truly,

G. H. PARKER.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. I will gladly yield to my colleague from Texas later on, if I have time. Some question was raised here as to whether or not through this plan, which I was forced the other day to term the "plundering Plumb plan," there is an effort here to force or coerce Congress to do anything, and the claim was made that there is no attempt to force this Congress in this manner.

A MEMBER. To coerce Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; that is a better term—to coerce Congress. I want to read you the last word on this proposition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to give me one minute more.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I now read excerpts from the Washington Post of this morning, on page 3, column 1, a dispatch from Paris, as follows:

GOMPERS BACKS BIG FOUR—SAYS WORKERS WILL COMPEL GOVERNMENT TO TAKE OVER ROADS—MUST HAVE PART IN ADMINISTRATION OF LINES.

PARIS, August 13.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to-day declared in favor of nationalization of American railways and labor's demand for an equal voice in their administration.

"American railway workers intend not only to compel the Government to take over the railways but will demand, as the logical next step, that labor shall be granted a permanent equal voice in railway administration," Gompers said in an interview.

* * * * * * *

"Previous methods have failed to achieve legitimate results. Hence we will be forced to use other means."

Is that a declaration of coercion to force this Government? What did Mr. Jewell, acting president of the railroad brotherhoods department of the American Federation of Labor, say in the press of Tuesday, August 5, would be done? He said that if Congress did not comply they would tie up every railroad in the country so tight that they could not be run. Which speaks more authoritatively, Mr. Gompers and Mr. Jewell or the ones who lately are seeking to deny threats and force?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer my question now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS] was the average wage of the switch engineer and the average wage of the passenger engineer.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but I am giving more definite information concerning all of them, as contained in this letter. As I said the other day, Congress has at last reached the Marne; the stopping point has been reached, and there must be a sane turning back, for the benefit of the 110,000,000 people of this Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, with regard to the duty on tungsten, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], by his questions addressed to my colleague [Mr. TIMBERLAKE], indicated a very natural and proper anxiety lest this tariff should increase the present high cost of living. I have before me some data furnished by some of the officers of the Boulder County Metal Mining Association of Colorado, going into that very question. These gentlemen call my attention to the fact, which we all know, that the principal use of tungsten is in the manufacture of tool steel, and to the further fact that it is used in that manufacture to the extent of somewhat less than one-fifth. Now, we are asking for a tariff of $10 per unit of tungstic trioxide as contained in a standard 60 per cent concentrate. This means 50 cents per pound of the oxide. Per pound of finished tool steel, therefore, the increase would be not more than 15 cents according to my correspondents, allowing for loss in smelting, and they are making a very liberal allowance for loss in smelting. Tungsten tool steel is used in general for the manufacture of high-class steels, and I am reliably informed that only 1 pound of tool steel is required for the production of from two to three thousand pounds of finished steel. Assuming, therefore, that 1 pound of tool steel per ton of finished steel is used, it will be obvious that the additional cost of finished steel due to the tariff is entirely negligible. In other words, 15 cents would be divided by 2,000, which equals seven and one-half one-thousandths of a cent per pound of finished steel, an entirely negligible addition to the cost of the finished steel product.

There is another aspect of the cost of living which my colleague brought out, that even in China and in Burma, where tungsten is produced from shallow alluvial deposits at a cost for labor of from 10 to 48 cents per day—and that low labor cost perhaps accounts for the amount of the product sent to the United States—tungsten is produced at such a low cost that the producers say they could still export it to the United States in large quantities and pay a tariff of $10 per unit and make money. How far does that contrast with the present situation? Tungsten is now admitted free, as I understand it, under the law of 1913. We have, therefore, had no revenue at all from the importation of tungsten since that tariff law went into effect. Notwithstanding that tariff law, we imported in 1918 nearly 6,000 tons of tungsten concentrate, according to information furnished by the United States Tariff Commission for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means at this session of Congress. Our estimated annual consumption of tungsten, both domestic and imported, is something like 7,000 tons. If we imported half of that, our revenue on this basis would be $2,100,000, a vast increase, I submit, as contrasted with our present revenue of nothing at all.

One gentleman suggested that mining conditions are not different from conditions in other lines of business, and that the reimbursement provided by the Government in the fund of eight and a half million dollars to the producers of war minerals was based on a faulty theory, because people engaged in other lines of business also entered into production for the Government during the war.

It would be very easy, Mr. Chairman, to demonstrate that the mining industry stands in a class by itself in that respect. Agriculture and manufacturing are conducted on a basis of cost and profit, which can be fairly well ascertained in advance. Losses from drought, floods, or pests, suspension of output through strikes or other industrial causes, are seldom complete, and even when so do not often involve an entire loss of the capital invested. In mining, on the other hand, the wisest human foresight sometimes can not prevent complete loss. Where ore is "in sight" or "blocked out," of course, it is possible to figure on the return, but ore is never "in sight" when the mine is started. Yet it is to the confidence of some men in its existence that we owe our steel mills, our automobile factories, our agricultural implements, our means of national defense, and the very coin that is the basis of our currency.

Mining is carried on at great expense, and it may or may not produce any returns. Vast fortunes have to be put into the ground on hope. A rich vein may produce returns for a while and then "pinch out." Reasonable foresight and a business-like regard for the capital invested may require continuance of exploration for many months without any further return. The property can not even be left idle without great expense to keep it from filling up with water.

And even before the stage of development begins mining districts must be located and their possibilities unfolded by the prospector. Concerning this, one of my constituents, Mr. Emerson J. Short, of Denver, employed this true and eloquent language in his testimony before the United States Tariff Commission at Denver last summer:

> Prospecting is an art born of long experience and certain natural traits, among which are patience, persistence, and a hopefulness and confidence that never despairs. The prospector carries with him the keys to the mineral kingdom of every nation, and the nation which by a shortsighted and ungrateful policy drives him from the field shall not enter that kingdom.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. May I have one minute more?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. VAILE. That the United States had strayed far from the safe portals of that kingdom when the World War came upon us was plainly shown by the frantic appeals which the Government sent out urging the production of war minerals. Those appeals were published in every paper in the mining districts. The reason it was necessary to send out those appeals was because the industry had virtually been killed off. If we had had an intelligent and consistent policy of protecting this industry and at the same time producing revenues for the Government, we would have had no occasion for frantic haste, we would not have been handicapped by the incomplete production which resulted from trying to stimulate an industry overnight, prospecting and development would have proceeded normally, and we would have been producing revenue right along and have had contented labor earning a fair wage in all these mining industries. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I always like to talk by the book, and I had hoped to be able to gather together some matter that would enable me to talk by the book to-day, but owing to the very considerable amount of time taken by the hearings in the committee of which I happen to be a member I have not had the opportunity to get together the material which I had hoped to use.

Therefore I am going to discuss the subject which I have in mind from a rather more general point of view than I had intended to do. A casual reading of the President's recent message on the high cost of living would seem to indicate that the President had in mind that the high cost of living was to a considerable extent due to profiteering. I do not think, however, that such a conclusion would be a very high compliment either to the President's information or intelligence, because it is very clear that the fundamental causes which underlie the high cost of living to-day are in very, very small part the result of profiteering as such. The profiteer has no friends. He ought to have none; and, so far as I am concerned, and so far as every Member of this House is concerned, I am sure we will all unite to provide legislative action upon which can be predicated such Executive action as will stop profiteering. [Applause.] But I venture to say that stopping profiteering will not come within a thousand miles of dealing in any fundamental way with the high cost of living.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has suggested that Congress will be quick to provide any additional legislation which may be needed to meet and punish profiteering. The gentleman, of course, does not intend to convey the impression that Congress has failed in its duty as it understood it in providing all of the legislation that had seemed to be necessary along that line?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not in the least. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] suggested, the President has had for two years, and still has, the power to place every manufacturer, every storer, every wholesaler, every retailer who does a business of more than $100,000 a year, under license. He can make it a condition of that license that the licensee will not conspire or arrange or agree with any other person for the purpose of maintaining prices. He can make it a condition of the license that the licensee will not exact or charge an exorbitant rate or profit. He can insert in that license conditions vastly more stringent, vastly more effective, than would be possible under any legislation which the Congress can pass now as permanent legislation, and he has had that power for two years and still has it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman mean to take the position that we have sufficient laws now? Is the gentleman opposed to the enactment of any additional laws in pursuance of the suggestion of the President?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all. I am saying the only suggestion that has been made to the committee of which I am a member is that those very laws which we have on the statute books relating to food shall be extended to wearing apparel and containers in which food is shipped. We are not asked to give further and more far-reaching powers with respect to food.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do.

Mr. AYRES. How does the gentleman get after the retailer? How do you get action on the retailer who sells less than $100,000 worth?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Michigan explained that very fully, and I do not want to take up my time in going into that.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman mean to say the President has authority to include in the wholesaler's license that he can not sell to the retailer only upon certain conditions?

Mr. ANDERSON. I mean to say he can make it a condition of the license of the wholesaler that he shall not sell goods to retailers who engage in certain practices, and in that way it gives the President a hold on the retailer.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman say the President has authority to do that?

Mr. ANDERSON. Those conditions were in the licenses which were issued.

Mr. GARNER. Of course, the gentleman will recall that his committee only handles one of these, while the President suggested four distinct different laws as a remedy. Now, the gentleman's committee is only handling one. I was wondering if the gentleman was going to consider and discuss the other three provisions.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Wyoming rather led me away from the line of discussion which I had intended to pursue, because, as I said in the first place, in my judgment, while profiteering unquestionably has had some effect, and, if it continues, will continue to have some effect, on the high cost of living, it is not the fundamental cause which underlies the high price of commodities to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield for just one brief question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not like to take the gentleman's time, but it is a very interesting and important subject. It would be perfectly idle for Congress further to extend the operations of the food-control act and include other articles if no more effort is made to enforce its provisions with regard to these additional articles than has been made up to this time in the enforcement of the provisions of the law as they relate to articles they now cover.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should say that was true, and especially true when based upon the lack of action upon implements, machinery, tools, and articles of that kind which are used in production. It would be perfectly idle to say, in fact it would be absurd to say, that the taking out of industry and of production of 40,000,000 men for a period of four years has had no effect whatever upon the world production. It is perfectly idle to say, at least so far as food products are concerned—and I think we can make the same statement in reference to practically all the necessaries of life—that there is not to-day, so far as the world at large is concerned, a shortage of production, or that without a limitation upon exports the short world production is not a factor in prices here. The present high cost of living, in my judgment, bears a closer relation to two factors than to any others, and those two factors are, first, the inflation of currency and credit, which was so well discussed the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and, secondly, the largely and constantly increasing tide of exports from this country. A survey of the rise of prices during the Civil War period and the period which followed the Civil War shows that that rise of prices was almost identical in its curve with the inflation of the currency.

And a study of the high prices to-day will show that while the advance of prices has been almost coincident with the increase in the currency, practically the same relation is found between the price of commodities to-day and the rising of the quantity of exports abroad. Of course, under present conditions a very large proportion of this export is on credit, and this credit has a tendency to further increase the inflation of credit and credit currency of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Does the gentleman from Oregon yield the time?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield it.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I said a moment ago, I expected to have here to-day the exact figures, but as I recall them our exports in 1914 were something about $2,000,000,000. In 1918 they were upward of $5,000,000,000. At the rate at which our exports are increasing during the current year they will be between $8,000,000,000 and $9,000,000,000. That is to say, during the current year our exports will be about four times as great as they were in 1914. Now, of course, a part of that increase in money is represented in the increased price of the commodities themselves, but that fact does not account for more than one-half of the increase. So it is quite clear that the exports during the current year are at least double and probably more than double the exports in 1914. And the examination of the price ratios will show that the prices to-day of most of the exportable commodities, particularly of food, are about twice what they were in 1914.

Now, it must be remembered that supply in an economic sense does not necessarily mean the amount which is in existence at a given time. It rather means the amount which is available for consumption at a given time. For instance, during the war there were something like 100,000,000 or 120,000,000 bushels of wheat in Australia. It was a part of the world's supply, and yet in an economic sense it did not affect the supply at all, because there were no ships to carry it, and therefore it did not go into the ordinary channels of commerce.

I venture to say if it were possible for us to go into the ownership of supplies of food and all other commodities in cold-storage and other warehouses in the country it would be found that a very large proportion of those stores are held in those warehouses for foreign account or held in anticipation of foreign demand, and when they are so held they are just as effectually taken out of the supply of this country as though they had moved from this country to Europe or to some other consuming section outside of the United States. Consequently we find ourselves to-day in very much the same position as we were at the beginning of the war, our large supplies contracted by foreign governments or held out of consumption in anticipation of foreign demand, and our own people competing against each other for the short supply remaining. That means that while we have an apparent abundance of all of these articles in the country, in fact, so far as the domestic supply is concerned, in an economic sense there is a real shortage.

Now, then, this condition exists with reference to wheat, and we propose to deal with that situation by limiting the exports of wheat. I am not now suggesting that there should be a limitation upon exports, but I do say that if we are going, or if the President is going, or anybody is going to undertake to deal with this situation in a fundamental way, in a way which will have any effect, it must either be done by bringing the currency into a closer relation with production or it must be done by a limitation of exports or by greatly increased world production.

Great complaint is made about the high price of wheat. I venture to say that wheat on a basis of the controlled price to-day is very much cheaper than cotton, and I will venture to say it is very much cheaper than most of the food products in the country. On the basis of the present price of cotton, wheat ought to be selling at $3.40 a bushel. Now, then, if it is fair, if it is proper, to limit the exports of wheat in order that the people may have cheap bread, is it not just as proper to limit the exports of cotton in order that the farmers may have cheaper overalls?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman want more time? I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Wyoming make a request?

Mr. MONDELL. I make the request that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time except as yielded by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield time to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. KITCHIN. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The gentleman's first statement was in reference to the embargo being placed on cotton. I will state to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, cotton was practically wholly embargoed during last season, as every southern port was closed and we could not reach the foreign market, as we had no ships.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am talking about the present time.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. There is no cotton on the market. The question is, Where does the gentleman get his figures in estimating the present value of wheat and the present value of cotton and in making his statement that wheat is cheaper than cotton? Why not compare cotton with that with which it is comparable in the clothing line, which is wool?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have made the comparison and I have carefully gone over the figures on the basis of the prices, the prewar price of cotton and the present price and the prewar price of wheat and the present price of wheat.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Did you include in those figures the year 1914, when the European war broke out, when the sale of cotton was made at an actual sacrifice, while the price of every other product went up, including wheat?

Mr. ANDERSON. I included the good and the bad in the cotton figures, just as I included the good and the bad in the wheat figures, the years of high production and the years of low production in both; and I think an examination of the record will clearly demonstrate that the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel is very, very much lower than cotton at 35 cents a pound.

Mr. CRISP. But cotton is not selling for 35 cents a pound.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. No. Cotton is not selling at 35 cents a pound. It sold last year and the year before at 27 and 28—that is, middling; the great majority is only middling—and I dare say it was not more than 20 cents a pound.

Mr. ANDERSON. All the wheat is under $2.26 when the price is controlled, not a majority of it.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. And guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. It has not cost the Government a dollar so far, and it will not cost the Government a dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended three minutes, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOKS] may have that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state a few facts to the House in regard to the Timberlake bill providing for a tariff on tungsten ore. We have a concern in our town—York, Pa.—known as the York Metal & Alloy Co., who are manufacturers of tungsten. They furnished the steel mills of the country during the war with this absolutely essential material which was necessary in the manufacture of armor plate, guns, and various tools used in the war. This company owns a tungsten-ore mine in Arizona, that they have been obliged to close down because it can not be operated even for their own use in competition with foreign ore.

I received a telegram from them recently, which reads as follows:

We earnestly urge your hearty support and influence in behalf of the Timberlake bill, imposing a duty of $10 on tungsten ore. This is absolutely essential for the domestic productions if the tungsten industry is to survive. Please do all you can for it.

This is a most important industry of our country, not only absolutely necessary in times of war, but the product of which must be used in peace times by all the machine shops and steel industries of our Nation. They can not do without it and therefore must have the protection asked for in the Timberlake bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States had come to no resolution thereon.

PRIVATE CALENDAR TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Friday, the 15th, is claims day. Bills on the Private Calendar will be called. I expect to ask unanimous consent, when we meet to-morrow, that bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to shall be considered.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FROM FRIDAY UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn until Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CANNON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting estimate of appropriations which will be necessary to enable that department to furnish to the people of the United States information regarding the stocks of food products held in storage and retail food prices (H. Doc. No. 187); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting copy of a communication of the Acting Secretary of Commerce, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to enable it to cooperate in the effort to reduce the cost of living (H. Doc. No. 188); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8141) to provide for the payment to Alice E. Wells, formerly Alice E. Davis, only heir at law of John C. Davis, deceased, of the amount stated in the findings of the Court of Claims in congressional case No. 9264, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 15, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek to guard the sacred honor of our country by keeping ever in touch with Thy law, by living in such personal communion with Thee as that we can draw the wisdom and grace from Thee which will justify our place in the government of this Nation. Let Thy blessing rest upon Thy servants this day. May they be guided by Thy Spirit in that which they say, in all which they plan, that God's name may be glorified by the work of this day and this country advance toward the great goal for which we live. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CARS FOR COAL SHIPMENT (S. DOC. NO. 73).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, certain information relative to the number of coal cars now in use in the transportation of coal, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8362) to amend and revise the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kayford, W. Va., praying for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WATSON. I present a petition signed by a large number of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the United States Army and Navy during the World War, requesting the enactment of a law giving each and every such honorably discharged soldier, sailor, and marine one year's extra pay for services rendered during the war. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIAL. I present an extract from the Weekly News Letter, a periodical issued by the Office of Information of the United States Department of Agriculture, relative to the uses by communities in the Southern States of their own resources of food instead of buying from other sources. I ask that the extract be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Weekly News Letter, periodical issued by Office of Information, United States Department of Agriculture, issue of July 30, 1919.]

FORMERLY IMPORTED PORK, NOW COUNTY SELLS IT.

Laurens County, S. C., is an example of how many communities in the Southern States are now using their own resources for food instead of buying food from other places. Laurens County formerly imported most of the pork products used by its people. Now Laurens County is selling pork.

The change began several years ago, when a bank in the county offered to provide funds for the purchase of blooded pigs for the use of boys who would promise to care for them. The county demonstration agent accordingly bought and placed a large number of pigs under a long-term-sale-at-cost arrangement. The boys took up the plan with enthusiasm. A year later the bank bought 124 more pigs, most of them gilts, and these were distributed.

The next year the county's production of pork exceeded household requirements and the demands of the home market. The county agent was brought into touch with packers, a local purchasing agency was established, and about 13 months ago a carload of pigs was shipped out. It was probably the first time, and certainly the first time since the sixties, that Laurens County had sold pork.

The bank which provided the way for the boys to buy their pigs has kept its offer continuously open and expects to do more along this line. Not a dollar has been lost of these advances, an official of the bank says.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a communication from the Board of Trade of Orlando, Fla., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORLANDO, FLA., August 7, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Board of Trade of Orlando, Fla., view with much concern the proposal to take over the operation of the railroads of this country, and at a special meeting of this organization, comprising 260 representative men of this community, the following resolution was adopted as expressing the sentiment of this section, to wit:

"We unhesitatingly call upon and urge the constituted authorities at Washington to refuse the proposal and all demands of labor for an increase in wages, and we call upon the Government to exhaust, if necessary, the entire financial and military resources at their command to defeat the attempted confiscation of private property."

Very truly, yours,

ORLANDO BOARD OF TRADE,
By E. G. DUCKWORTH, President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present resolutions adopted by the County Board of Trade of Ocala, Fla., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARION COUNTY BOARD OF TRADE,
Ocala, Fla., August 8, 1919.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Marion County Post, No. 1, of the American Legion, to forward to you the inclosed copy of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the organization in Ocala yesterday afternoon.

Respectfully, yours,

LOUIS H. CHAZAL, Post Adjutant.

Whereas our country has reached a critical period in its history and has need of wise and sober readjustment of its social and economic conditions; and

Whereas it is a time when the welfare of the great majority of the people should take precedence over the demands of a selfish minority; and

Whereas we believe that the country will enjoy an era of unprecedented prosperity if conditions are readjusted on a sound basis; and

Whereas we believe that conditions can best be readjusted by a return to reasonable profits in the sale of the necessities of life, to the highest efficiency on the part of labor, and to an increased production: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Marion County Post of the American Legion, Post No. 27, of the State of Florida, That we who served in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps during the World War and who helped to make the world a fit place in which to live do earnestly protest against all profiteers and against the threats of organized labor to paralyze the railroads, and thus bring about untold suffering, increasing instead of alleviating the hardships, making the problems greater instead of solving them; and be it further

Resolved, That we do denounce as unpatriotic and un-American the talk of revolution on the part of some of the labor leaders; and be it further

Resolved, That we call on the Congress to take immediate steps to reduce the high cost of living, and do call on all citizens to assist and not to prevent a solution of our problems by extreme and radical demands.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present resolutions adopted by Local Union No. 259, National Federation of Postal Employees, of Tampa, Fla., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the past year has conclusively demonstrated the total inadequacy of the scale of wages inaugurated on July 1, 1918, to accomplish its avowed purpose of meeting the extraordinary war prices; and

Whereas the present prices are no longer extraordinary, but, according to all competent authorities, will never sink below the common level attained in the year 1918; and

Whereas we are informed from the same sources that for some time to come still further increases in the cost of living are to be looked forward to; and

Whereas the very highest grade attainable for postal employees in the Tampa office, namely, that grade which pays $1,500 yearly, has been proven sadly inadequate to meet local conditions, much less so the lower grades, which number among their unfortunates over 50 per cent of the employees of the office; and

Whereas it is an incontrovertible fact that the nature and requirements of the class of work the postal employee is engaged in places him well in the foremost ranks of the skilled worker; and

Whereas a review of the scale of wages paid to both skilled and unskilled workers, nay, even common laborers, in every conceivable branch of industrial activity throughout the United States finds the postal employee well to the foot of the list with respect to remuneration received for the important and essential services he renders in the handling of the mails; and

Whereas in no other business do we find an employee receiving less for his overtime than for his regular time, as is the case with the postal employee, but rather double time or time and a half; and

Whereas the peculiar conditions obtaining in Tampa with respect to the arrival of the heaviest mails after nightfall necessitate the assignment of a considerable proportion of the office to night duty; and

Whereas the involuntary subjection of these men to the unnatural and unhealthful conditions involved in such night duty is manifestly unjust, unless in part compensated by a shorter tour of duty: Therefore we, the members of Tampa Local No. 259, of the National Federation of Postal Employees, in consideration of the foregoing preamble, do hereby offer the following resolutions, copies of which we respectfully submit to our accredited Senators and Representatives in Congress for their earnest consideration and attention:

Resolved, That a law be immediately enacted reclassifying postal clerks into three successive grades, beginning with an initial grade paying $1,800 per annum; second grade, $2,100 per annum; third grade, $2,400 per annum, promotions automatic upon one year's satisfactory service in each preceding grade.

Resolved, That the foregoing reclassification as given be retroactive to July 1, 1919.

Resolved, That postal clerks be paid time and one half time for all overtime and double time for all Sunday and holiday service.

Resolved, That six hours' work shall constitute a day's work whenever the major portion of a tour of duty shall embrace a period after nightfall.

Resolved, That one-half time be allowed for sickness on presentation of a doctor's certificate.

Resolved, That substitutes be paid at the rate of 80 cents per hour.

CONRAD W. CUNEO.
M. B. MCCONNELL.
JOSEPHINE J. SEWARD.

Mr. LODGE. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from delegates of 126 Greek communities and 56 societies in the United States and American-born citizens, assembled in Mechanics Hall at Boston, Mass., on the 10th instant, remonstrating against the giving of Thrace to Bulgaria, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, August 11, 1919.

Senator LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, Washington, D. C.

The delegates of 126 Greek communities and 56 societies in the United States and American-born citizens, assembled Sunday, August 10, in Mechanics' Building, Boston, resolved that—

"Whereas the Great War has been fought to establish justice and principle of self-determination; and

"Whereas America has by its moral and physical force consecrated the principle of nationalities; and

"Whereas we have pledged our honor that we will apply justice to all races; and

"Whereas the Greeks have just and valid claim to Thrace, Northern Epirus, the 12 islands of the Ægean, and western Asia Minor on the principle of nationality as admitted by all the delegates at the peace conference; and

"Whereas the claims advanced by the Bulgarians upon Thrace are based only upon economic considerations; and

"Whereas the Bulgarians have in the past demonstrated their inability to govern non-Bulgarian races in justice and have perpetrated horrible crimes against Greeks, Serbians, Turks, and humanity at large; and

"Whereas Greece has shown her capacity for governing equitably non-Hellenic races; and

"Whereas for the Greek Nation the question of Thrace is one of vital importance, and unless solved justly will drive the Greek people to desperation, to go to war against Bulgaria in order to liberate the Province:

"Now, therefore, we, American citizens, native born and of Greek descent, friends of the Greek Nation, as well as of all other nations, subscribers to the principle of self-determination, convinced of the right of the Greek cause, and believing that no other solution but a just one on the principle of nationality will bring peace in the Balkans, respectfully represent to the august Senate of the United States our desire that justice be done to the Greek race, that Thrace and northern Epirus and the islands be united with the free Kingdom of Greece in order that the universal sentiment of Greece in America be not shocked by the surrender of purely Greek populations to our enemies.

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be addressed to the entire press of the United States for the warm support it has given to the just cause of the Greek Nation.

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be addressed to Senators LODGE, BRANDEGEE, KING, and MOSES for the stand they have taken in defending the justice of Greece before the Senate of the United States of America.

"Resolved, That a protest be respectfully addressed to Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, for his unwarranted statement in behalf of delivering Thrace to Bulgaria for economic reasons, in violation of the principle of self-determination, with a prayer that the Senator may reconsider the case of Thrace and do justice to Greece.

"Resolved, That a special vote of thanks be addressed to the New York Times, Herald, Tribune, World, Chicago Tribune, News, Post, Journal, Springfield Republican, Philadelphia Ledger, Washington Post, Kansas City Star, Boston Transcript, Herald, Globe, Post, Christian Science Monitor, for their impartial presentation of the Greek questions before the just tribunal of the American people.

"T. Magafas, for South Carolina committee, chairman; Hon. Albert Langtry, secretary Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Sergt. H. Korgis (who captured 256 Germans), Company L, Twenty-third Infantry, Second Division, chairman delegates on behalf of 65,000 Greek-American soldiers; Mayor Peters, Boston; Lieut. Col. Frank Perkins, the "go to hell colonel"; Capt. Winifred MacBrayne, Aviation Corps; Dr. Chas. Fleischer; Miran Sevasly, director Armenian Union, America; Dr. M. M. Eichler, director Zionist Bureau, America; William Flatmayer, Taunton, Mass.; Joseph Horton, principal of schools, Ipswich, Mass.; Bishop Rodgstolou Alexander, for Greek churches of America; N. J. Cassavetes, for Panepirotic Union, America; Emmanuel Anghelakis, for Macedonian-Thracian Union; C. Moustakis, chairman delegates, Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Dr. A. Vryones, for State of Connecticut; Christus Staikos, for State of New York; L. Kalyvas, for Rhode Island; C. Vafiades, for Maine; A. Benachi, for Florida; Dr. George Katsainos, for California; Jason Kokinsatos, for Washington, D. C.; B. Hadjiy Annis, for Chicago; Aristomene Lynardos, for Ohio; Michael Iatrou, for Pennsylvania; Dr. E. Despotes, for Vermont; N. Copadis, for New Hampshire; N. Moustakis, for Michigan; Rev. Christus Anghelopoulos, for Utah; Rev. Vasil Papanicas, for New Jersey; Mrs. M. Panagopoulos, for Wisconsin; Seraphin Canoutas, for Louisiana; Dr. A. Vrachnos, for Texas; John Kritaos, for Virginia; Nicholas Trysicopoulos, for Indiana; Andrew Hadjis, for Nevada; John Panose, for Iowa; M. Boutsalis, for Minnesota; M. Stavrupoulos, for Maryland; G. Mulonas, for Colorado; M. Kalyvas, for Missouri; Rev. G. Papaioannon, for Georgia; George Gerondakis, for Idaho; Dr. B. Despotas, for Oregon; Dr. D. Mitsakoe, for Tennessee."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a petition adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of the Virgin Islands asking the American Congress to do something to try to Americanize the Virgin Islands, a matter which I hope will receive early attention.

To all whom it may concern:

This is to certify that Mr. Rothschild Francis, native of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands of the United States, 27 years old, and member of our city council, St. Thomas, was duly elected delegate at a monster mass meeting of the working people of this island held on the Parade Ground, St. Thomas, on the 20th of July, 1919, for the purpose of making a direct appeal to Congress or a committee thereof by laying before them this, our petition. Said Mr. Rothschild Francis is hereby given this mandate for the uses and purposes aforementioned.

We beg to state that all assistance and courtesies extended to this delegate on our behalf will be highly appreciated by us.

We most respectfully petition the Congress, or a committee thereof, that it will adopt such measures as will tend to bring about the following reforms in our island home, St. Thomas:

1. That our status be determined and a bill of rights fully specified.
2. That our code of laws be laid before our council for adoption at an early date.
3. That our said code of laws include the following: (a) Suffrage based on manhood; (b) a workingman's compensation act; (c) an act to regulate the scale of wages for the working people, which shall tend to improve their present miserable economic condition; (d) a homestead act that will tend to bring into occupancy and cultivation all public lands and such other lands as are not at present under cultivation and such as may from time to time become so. It is a fact that there are large portions of such lands to be found here at present.
4. That a commission be sent to investigate conditions in St. Thomas, and, as far as possible, some measures be adopted to remedy our serious economic plight.
5. That our present judiciary be organized on the American system.
6. That our present school system be made in direct accord with the American system of free schools.
7. That a better regulated postal system and service be established and maintained.
8. That most public offices in this island be filled by our qualified natives, and this we hold as our inalienable right, with the exception that the heads of our governmental departments be American citizens, but only in so far as is absolutely necessary.
9. That our island, St. Thomas, be Americanized as quickly as possible, and that all acts and things be done as will tend thereto.

Finally, we beg to emphasize that our delegate, Mr. Rothschild Francis, is directed to address the Congress, or a committee thereof, or any other person or persons as he may deem expedient and necessary, upon matters touching our island. We further beg to state that we repose implicit confidence in Mr. Rothschild Francis, who has a very good reputation in this community.

Signed this 26th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1919.

Chas. A. Emanuel, Syranus De Graff, Ernest Rowell, Ludwig Rogers, Rothschild Francis, V. A. Forde, Randolph A. Innis, Maximillian Wallace, Hubert Hatchett, John C. Keaser, Nathaniel E. Duvergee, Z. Keating, Federico Guirty.

This 26th day of July, 1919, before me came Charles A. Emanuel, Syranus De Graff, Ernest Rowell, Ludwig Rogers, Rothschild Francis, V. A. Forde, Randolph A. Innis, Maximillian Wallace, Hubert Hatchett, John C. Keaser, Nathaniel E. Duvergee, Z. Keating, and Federico Guirty, who are known to me to be the individuals who executed in my presence the above instrument.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a communication in the nature of a petition from the National Equal Rights League, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL EQUAL RIGHTS LEAGUE,
OFFICE OF THE RECORDING SECRETARY, 906 T STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., August 13, 1919.

In the behalf of the National Equal Rights League, acting for the millions of colored Americans, we place in your hands for presentation to the Senate the following petition for an amendment to the covenant of the league of nations to the end of vouchsafing equality of rights for all, regardless of race, color, or creed.

Please find herewith our petition with some several signed copies thereof attached.

Praying the exercise of your official prerogative in the presentation of this petition to the Senate, we are,

Yours for true world democracy,

ALLEN W. WHALEY,
New York.
JOSEPH H. STEWART,
Washington, D. C.
C. M. TANNER,
Washington, D. C.
MAURICE W. SPENCER,
District of Columbia.
BYRON GUNNER,
New York.
WM. MONROE TROTTER,
Massachusetts.
JOHN R. HAWKINS.

To the SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

We, the undersigned, petition the Senate of the United States of America, which, by virtue of its treaty-making power, must give to the league of nations covenant its assent before such covenant can be finally adopted, in the fulfillment of the noble purpose of the recent World War, repeatedly proclaimed by this Government and its Allies while the result was in doubt, viz: To establish real democracy everywhere, to make the world safe for democracy and a safe place to live in, to insert or add by way of amendment while said covenant is before the Senate the following clause:

"Real democracy for the world being the avowed aim of the nations establishing the league of nations, the contracting parties agree to vouchsafe to their own citizens the possession of full liberty, rights of democracy, and protection of life without restriction or distinction based on race, color, creed, or previous condition."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RANSDELL, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to which was referred the bill (S. 1660) to provide a division of tuberculosis in, and an advisory council for, the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 147) thereon.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 148) thereon.

TUG RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with amendment to the title the bill (S. 2700) granting the consent of Congress to the D. E. Hewitt Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River connecting Martin County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 149) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tug River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of said bridge being in Martin County, Ky., and the other end of the said bridge being on the opposite side of the Tug River, at Kermit, in Mingo County, in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Martin County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va."

PRICE OF COAL.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate resolution 126, submitted by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on the 18th ultimo, and I call his attention to the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas for several years the price of coal to the consumer has from time to time been largely increased; and

Whereas for a period this increase in price was attributed to existing war conditions; and

Whereas in spite of the fact that since the armistice was signed, November 11, 1918, normal peace conditions have prevailed, the price of coal has continued to rise, without any apparent economic or other proper reason therefor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, be instructed to make inquiry into the cause or causes which have brought about the enormous increase in the market price of coal, and to that end obtain full data regarding freight rates, wages, profits, and other matters bearing upon the question under consideration, with a view to determining who or what may be responsible for such increase in price, whether due to economic causes, and therefore proper and right, or whether due to manipulation or profiteering on the part of miners, shippers, or dealers in coal.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, to send for persons and papers, and do such further acts as may be necessary to secure any and all information desired in the furtherance of said inquiry.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce shall report its findings to the Senate, together with such recommendations as may be pertinent and advisable, with a view either to congressional or Executive action, in order to remedy existing conditions or the punishment of any individual or corporation deemed guilty of unlawful acts.

Resolved further, That the expense of the aforesaid inquiry be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2805) for the relief of Lewis Doll; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2806) granting an increase of pension to John B. Senecal; to the Committee on Pensions.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

I wish to say to the Senate that this bill is identical with the one introduced by myself as Senate bill 1269 on June 2, 1919, with the amendments as agreed to by the committee. I was instructed by the Public Lands Committee to introduce a new bill as amended, and then I was also instructed to report the bill favorably to the Senate, which I do at this time and ask that it go to the calendar. I wish to give notice at this time that at the very first opportunity I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration; and in passing I desire to say that the report on the bill is a unanimous one from the Public Lands Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. FALL. By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I offer the following resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 163) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Subcommittee on Foreign Relations appointed under authority of Senate resolution 106, to investigate Mexican affairs, be, and it hereby is, authorized to send for persons, books, and papers; to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses; to administer oaths; to conduct hearings; to travel to and from any points where a sitting of the committee may be necessary; to employ interpreters, stenographers, clerks, and any other necessary assistance and to provide for the care and preservation of testimony, papers, and documents.

The expenses of said subcommittee and its necessary assistance in discharging its duties under the provisions of said resolution 106 and of this present resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the subcommittee.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 162), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the special committee of the Senate appointed to devise a plan for a budget system is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; to employ stenographers to report such hearings as may be had; to have the testimony and proceedings of such hearings printed for the use of the committee; to employ a clerk, a messenger, and such clerical assistance as may be necessary; and to employ one or more economists at a rate not to exceed $25 per day, the compensation of the above-mentioned employees and the necessary expenses of the committee to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

That the committee is authorized to sit in the vacation of the Senate.

REGULATION OF STORAGE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a day or two ago I received a telegram from Louis F. Swift with reference to the packing business. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD this telegram and my reply thereto without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, August 13, 1919.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to your remarks before the House Committee on Agriculture and on floor of Senate, Swift & Co. has not opposed sane regulation of storage methods. Six years ago at the annual meeting, January 2, 1913, in my address to shareholders, I said, "What is needed at this time is proper regulation, covering inspection in and out of store, the proper limit of time of storage (not to exceed 12 months or from season to season), and the education of the consuming public." Our present position is unchanged.

Swift & Co. has not disregarded the law of supply and demand; rather we are controlled by it at all times.

Conservation and not speculation is the motive behind storing perishable food products. Swift & Co.'s cold-storage business is a necessity incident to handling of perishable goods to carry over stocks from season of surplus production to season of scarcity or no production, thereby avoiding violent price fluctuations and making goods cheaper during season of natural scarcity.

Any law that will tend to hamper, discourage, or make more uncertain this necessary function of conserving food will result in discouragement in production and higher food costs.

Many features of your bill are impracticable and will only tend to reduce the quantity of perishable food stored to the injury of producers and consumers. Would be glad to cooperate with you in revising sections which appear impracticable.

Swift & Co. denies that the packers are in control of the cold-storage business of the country. Neither Swift & Co. nor the five large packers have a monopoly of freezer space. Swift & Co. freezer capacity is only a very small fraction of the total freezer capacity of the country, and the capacity of the five large packers probably is only a small percentage of the total.

Morning papers of 12th feature Bureau of Markets storage report for July 1, which shows 1,334,000,000 pounds of meat in storage. This stock is not being hoarded. Sixty-two per cent consists of meats in process of being cured in pickle or salt. Twelve per cent is pork, which had to be frozen because all curing vats were full at the time. Later on this pork must be put through the regular curing process. Seven per cent represents fairly normal stock of lard. Greater part of remaining 19 per cent consists of frozen beef and mutton put away mainly for overseas shipment. Domestic trade does not care for frozen meats, but even if this frozen beef and mutton were available for and wanted by the domestic trade the quantity would be of little consequence, as it amounts to only 1½ pounds per capita.

AUGUST 14, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Your telegram of August 13, 1919, was delivered to me a little after 12 o'clock last night. At that time the telegram was already in print in the morning papers.

What you may have told your shareholders appears to me to be immaterial. I made the statement that you and your associate packers did not appear before Senator Heyburn's committee in July and in September, 1910, and the best that he could get out of you gentlemen when he appeared there for the committee was your prepared answers to written questions. This appears from pages 266 and following in Report No. 1272 of the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate, 1910.

1. You state in your telegram that you are controlled by the law of supply and demand. If this is correct will you explain why poultry, with three times as much on hand in June, 1919, as there was in June, 1918, is about 4 cents higher?

2. You say that conservation is the motive behind storing perishable food products. If this is so, why do you wish the time limit extended beyond one year, and why do you demand 15 months for butter and 18 months for cheese?

3. Why do you demand 12 months for eggs, when you stated in 1910 that you kept them as long as 15 months?

4. Why do you keep beef, frozen and unfrozen, 15 months? If you want simply to carry it over from a period of plenty to a period of scarcity, as you profess, why keep it 15 months, as you say you do in your written report of 1910?

5. You say that many features of my bill are impracticable. Why do you not point out which ones are and which ones are not?

6. Do you object to the antitrust features of my bill, and, if so, why do you object to them?

7. You say in your written report that the average time that you keep eggs is seven months. The time limit fixed by my bill is seven months. Why do you object to this limit?

8. Section 7 of the bill provides that goods that have been frozen in cold storage shall not be offered for sale except in a frozen condition; and any such products that have been once frozen and thereafter thawed, inflated, injected, or in any other way manipulated so as to alter its appearance and make it resemble an unfrozen product shall be deemed to be adulterated. This simply prevents a fraud being perpetrated on the public. Do you object to this provision of the bill?

9. Section 8 provides that no food products coming within the provisions of the bill shall be placed in cold storage if diseased in any way or if in unsound condition, or if not caught, handled, or slaughtered in a sanitary manner, or if not properly cooled or stored. Do you object to this provision of the bill?

10. Do you object to sections 10, 11, 12, and 13?

11. Do you object to section 14 of the bill? If so, state your objections specifically to each one of these sections.

12. Section 2 of the bill, in part, provides as follows: "Any other articles used for human food which, having been held in cold storage for any period of time and have been removed therefrom and returned again to cold storage, without reference to the time the same has been held in cold storage," shall be deemed adulterated. Do you favor this provision of the bill? If not, give your reasons.

13. You say in your telegram: "Would be glad to cooperate with you in revising sections which appear impracticable." If you wish to cooperate, kindly give your full answers to all the foregoing questions.

14. You say that you have not a monopoly of the freezer space. According to the best statistics we have here, the five large packers have over 200,000,000 cubic feet out of a little more than 400,000,000 cubic feet of all the freezer space. Are these figures correct; and if not, will you give me the correct figures?

15. Have you a gentleman's agreement, or any other kind of an agreement, express or implied, in reference to the territory in which all or any one of the five packers may operate?

16. Have you any agreement or understanding, expressed or implied, direct or indirect, as to prices to be paid for the products going into cold storage, or any of them?

17. Do your employees, agents, or representatives have daily or weekly conferences with the employees, agents, or representatives of any one or more of the other four packers; and if so, what is the object of these conferences? Is the question of price discussed at these conferences?

18. Are the various cold-storage products of like kind of the several packers sold at the same price or different prices; and if so, will you give me illustrations of difference in prices at which the packers have sold within the last year?

19. What instructions have your agents and representatives in the various States to get up propaganda against the Kenyon bill and the Kendrick bill and the cold-storage bills now pending in Congress? If instructions have been given in writing, will you furnish a copy of the instructions? If they have been given verbally, will you describe the methods by which they are given and the substance of such instructions?

20. Have you any agreement, express or implied, with those to whom you sell your products that they shall demand not less than a certain price for them?

21. Have you any agreement, express or implied, with the retailers, or do you require any agreement, express or implied, between wholesalers and retailers concerning prices?

22. Will you furnish the average price or prices paid by you for No. 1 eggs in the month of June, 1918, and the average price or prices paid by you for No. 1 eggs in June, 1919; also the average price or prices at which you sold eggs to the wholesaler during the two said months, and the average price or prices at which the wholesalers soid to the retailers during the two said months, and the average price or prices at which the retail dealers sold to the consumers during the two said months?

23. Are you in agreement with the other four packers for the division of live-stock purchases throughout the United States, according to certain fixed percentages?

24. Do you exchange confidential information with the other four companies which is not made available to their competitors, and employ jointly with them paid agents to secure information which is used to control and manipulate live-stock markets?

25. Do you have joint paid agents in attendance upon the Congress at Washington? If so, what are their names?

26. If you have no joint or several agents, if you have individual agents representing you, will you give their names and their duties?

27. Have you any understanding with your four associates in the purchase of live stock in the way commonly known as "split shipments," "part purchases," "wiring on," and "making"?

28. Do you exchange information with the other four regarding margins realized in the sale of meat?

29. Do you have an inspection of one another's stock of fresh meats?

30. Have you a joint action or understanding in underselling independent competitors by a system of rotation, each of the members of the combination in turn assuming the burden of cutting prices to the competitors' customers?

31. What other meat-packing concerns or meat-dealing concerns are you interested in?

32. Have you or your company any stock in so-called independent storage companies, and if so, which ones?

33. Please state whether or not your agents or representatives and the agents and representatives of the other four large packers meet in each large city in which you do business to consider the general good of the five?

34. Are these meetings weekly or daily? And give fully the purpose of the meetings.

Your full and complete answers to these questions at a very early date would greatly aid us in dealing with this subject. I am taking the liberty of putting this letter in the RECORD, together with a copy of your telegram, inasmuch as you published your telegram at practically the same time it was sent to me.

I hope you will answer these questions explicitly and in detail, and inasmuch as you used your telegram, apparently, as an advertisement, I shall take great pleasure in putting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your answer to this letter, if you will make it explicit enough to be of value, either to you or to the country.

Very truly, yours, KENNETH MCKELLAR.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1699, the civil-service retirement bill.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Wednesday next, August 20, I shall submit some remarks on the league of nations.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask permission to read a very brief letter, which is of exceeding interest, on the subject of the high cost of living. It is from Mr. Quincy T. Hardtner, a very prominent citizen of my State, and discusses a matter which I think is of unusual interest. It is from Urania, La., and is dated August 6, 1919:

THE URANIA LUMBER CO. (LTD.),
Urania, La., August 6, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been reading with much interest the discussion and debate on the bill now before Congress in regard to the packers, and I am inclosing herewith copy of a letter I wrote to the Cassidy

Southwestern Commission Co., St. Louis, Mo., and their reply. There seems to be something wrong with the packing industry, and it seems that the producer gets the worst end of it. We have been occasionally shipping cattle to St. Louis for the past several years and have had ample experience as to what cattle bring on the market, and we also butcher our own beef at this point and sell it in our market. We know what it is worth after being butchered. I wrote to the Cassidy Southwestern Commission Co. in reference to this single case of a cow that we butchered in an endeavor to learn why this wide difference of values here and in St. Louis, as between a cow that we butcher and as to what she would bring on the market in St. Louis. I am inclosing this correspondence, thinking that possibly it might be of some interest to you in view of the present legislation pending.

With kind regards, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

Q. T. HARDTNER.

Here is the letter of Mr. Hardtner, dated July 28, 1919, addressed to the Cassidy Southwestern Commission Co. (Ltd.):

THE URANIA LUMBER CO. (LTD.),
Urania, La., July 28, 1919.

CASSIDY SOUTHWESTERN COMMISSION CO.,
St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: We received your stock report last week and note that canners were still selling at 4¼ cents. It happened that the same day we butchered a cow—

I hope the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will listen carefully to this:

It happened that the same day we butchered a cow that would class as a canner, and we are giving you the full figures comparing what this cow brought here and what she would have brought had we shipped her to St. Louis and sold her as a canner. She weighed 525 pounds gross, and she dressed 227 pounds beef, at 25 cents per pound—$56.75. The hide, 52 pounds, at 40 cents—$20.80—making a total of $77.50. Had we shipped her to St. Louis, weight here 525 pounds, less 10 per cent for shrinkage en route, 52 pounds, total gross 473 pounds, price offered 4¼ cents, would bring $20.10 less freight and commission of 1 cent per pound—$4.73—leaving a net amount of $15.37 that we would have received for this cow in St. Louis, which brought us $77.50 here after being butchered. I think I have been very conservative in my figures for the price of beef, 25 cents per pound, as a packer's agent was here this morning and said it was worth 30 cents. The price of 40 cents per pound for the hide is also very conservative since we sold hides the same day that this cow was butchered at 41½ cents per pound and the next day we were offered 45 cents.

Now comes the part that is of very unusual interest.

Now the most ridiculous part about this business is that if we had come to the question of shipping her to St. Louis and selling her as a canner or just killing her here and selling the hide, throwing all beef away, we would have been ahead of the game $5.43 as against shipping her to St. Louis. This matter I can not understand and I am writing you at length asking if you can give me some information why such conditions exist. This cow's hide alone is worth as much in St. Louis as here and at the price of 40 cents it amounts to $20.80, whereas the whole cow would only bring $15.27 if sold as a canner in St. Louis.

If you can explain the above matter to me I would be greatly obliged to you, as I admit I am greatly puzzled over the proposition.

Yours, very truly,

THE URANIA LUMBER CO. (LTD.),
Q. T. HARDTNER, General Manager.

I am sorry I can not introduce here the reply of the commission company to this letter, for it is quite illuminating, but the company is not willing to have it introduced. I simply wish to call the attenton of the Senate to the fact that one of my constitutents who is in the business of raising cattle along with other things finds that he can sell a cow for $77.50 by butchering it and selling it out to his own people, for which he would have received only $15.43 if he had sent it to St. Louis and sold it, I presume to the meat packers, and that the hide of the cow would have netted him $20.80 had he sold it at his own home, or $5.43 more than he would have gotten for the whole cow had he shipped her to St. Louis. I can not explain this, but it indicates very forcibly that farmers, who produce cattle, are not getting much of the very high cost of beef to the consumers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as a contribution to the literature upon the subject of the high cost of living I direct the attention of the Senate for a moment to a couple of circulars which have reached me within the past few days. These are prospectuses, one issued in advocacy of the sale of $7,200,000 of 6 per cent cumulative preferred stock of the Quaker Oats Co. The other is a similar prospectus in advocacy of the promotion of $4,300,000 of 8 per cent cumulative sinking-fund first preferred stock of the Amalgamated Sugar Co.

The capitalization outstanding of the Quaker Oats Co. preferred is $18,000,000 and common $9,000,000, or a total of $27,000,000. The total net assets of the company are said to be $31,000,000, against $18,000,000 of preferred stock outstanding, after deducting prior liabilities and reserves of every character.

The net earnings available for dividends in the past 10 years are said to have averaged more than four and three-fourths times the dividend requirements on the preferred stock outstanding.

The net earnings for 1918, before deducting Federal taxes, were $6,407,760, or nearly six times the dividend requirements on the total outstanding preferred stock, including this new issue.

After deducting Federal taxes they were $3,502,589, and for the past year they averaged $3,509,188, or more than three and two-tenths times this requirement.

These figures make no allowance for saving in interest charges on floating debt to be retired.

During the last 10 years $13,301,467 have been reinvested in the business out of earnings.

Since the organization $15,349,909 have thus been put back out of earnings, equal to over 85 per cent of the entire outstanding preferred stock, including this new issue.

Mr. President, the business of this company, as I am informed, is confined to the manufacture and sale of a breakfast cereal known as Quaker Oats. The capitalization is enormous. The earnings for the past two years on this capitalization have been enormous also. It is now proposed, instead of reducing the cost to the consumer, to increase the capitalization and spread the dividends by another issue of $7,200,000, to be sold at $99 per share with accrued dividends.

The presentation of the case for the Amalgamated Sugar Co. is equally interesting. This has a present outstanding preferred stock, 8 per cent cumulative sinking issue, of $5,000,000 and outstanding common stock of $6,824,400, a total of $11,824,400 out of an authorized issue of $30,000,000. The amount which the public is now invited to subscribe to has a par value of $4,300,000.

The company is one of the important sugar producers of the States, operating factories in Utah and Idaho with an average daily capacity of 5,400 tons of beets, or 1,188,000 pounds of sugar.

The annual net income of this company, after payment of all taxes, including Federal taxes for the last five years ended February 28, 1919, available for dividends, averages $1,485,000, and for the last three years there has been an average of $1,608,000. The annual dividend requirements of the $5,000,000 of stock are $400,000.

After giving effect to the new financing, the net current assets of the company as of February 28, 1919, were $5,020,000, and total net assets $13,366,000, against which this $5,000,000 of preferred stock would be a first charge.

Here, again, Mr. President, is a company assuring the public of earnings yielding enormous profits which it proposes to further distribute without reducing their cost to the public by an added issue of $4,300,000 worth of preferred stock with a guaranteed cumulative sinking-fund dividend of 8 per cent.

Mr. President, this is one of the few things which, in my judgment, may be reached by Congress and by the administration. It will not do for these combinations to contend that they are charging normal rates and making normal profits upon the necessities of life on the one hand and on the other appeal to the investing public to invest in their added securities by the tempting display of such abnormal and extortionate profit.

I ask that these two circulars may be inserted in the RECORD without further comment.

There being no objection, the circulars were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEVEN MILLION TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS—THE QUAKER OATS CO. 6 PER CENT CUMULATIVE PREFERRED STOCK, PAR VALUE $100 PER SHARE.

[Dividends paid quarterly on last days of February, May, August, and November. Northern Trust Co., transfer agent Central Trust Co. of Illinois, registrar.]

CAPITALIZATION.

Capitalization upon completion of present financing.

	Authorized.	Outstanding.
Preferred stock, 6 per cent cumulative	$25,000,000	$18,000,000
Common stock	25,000,000	9,000,000

The Quaker Oats Co. was incorporated September 21, 1901, and later succeeded the American Cereal Co., some of whose predecessors date back to 1854. To-day it is the largest manufacturer in the world of oatmeal, rolled oats, corn meals, hominy, barley, and similar cereal food products, and of commercial mixed feeds for horses, mules, cattle, dairy cows, hogs, and other animals, and poultry, and has also a very large flour-milling business. Its products are marketed throughout the world, chiefly under the well-known "Quaker," "Schumacher," and "Mother's" trade-marks. It has mills at Akron, Ohio; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Fort Dodge, Iowa; Battle Creek, Mich; Tecumseh, Mich.; Morris, Ill.; Richford, Vt.; Petersborough, Ontario; London, Ontario; Neepawa, Manitoba; and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; 49 sales officers and 59 country elevators in the United States and Canada.

From the accompanying letter of Mr. H. P. Crowell, president, we summarize as follows:

"The company has no funded debt, and no mortgage on real estate or plant (other than purchase money obligations) can be created without assent of majority of both preferred and common stockholders.

"Proceeds of this $7,200,000 preferred stock, together with $750,000 new common stock, will be used to reduce floating debt, incurred in part for plant additions, thus increasing working capital and further strengthening the company's financial position.

"This stock is preferred as to assets and dividends, and no dividend may be paid on the common stock in any year until after dividends on the preferred stock for that year have been actually paid or set apart.

"Total net assets, not including any valuation for trade-marks, patents, good will, and other intangible assets, are in excess of $31,000,000, against $18,000,000 preferred stock outstanding. This is after deducting all prior liabilities and reserves of every character and applying proceeds of present and recent financing, and is based on values of plant, etc., considerably less than present replacement costs.

"Net earnings available for dividends, past 10 years, have averaged more than four and three-fourths times dividend requirements on preferred stock then outstanding.

"Net earnings, 1918, before deducting Federal taxes, were $6,407,760, or nearly six times dividend requirement on total outstanding preferred stock, including this new issue. After deducting Federal taxes, they were $3,502,589, and for the past five years have averaged $3,509,188, or more than three and one-fifth times this requirement. These figures make no allowance for saving in interest charges on floating debt to be retired.

"During last 10 years $13,301,467 has been reinvested in the business out of earnings, exceeding the combined preferred and common stock dividends paid during that period. Since organization $15,349,909 has thus been put back out of earnings, equal to over 85 per cent of entire outstanding preferred stock, including this new issue.

"The preferred stock in 1916 and 1917 sold on the Chicago Stock Exchange up to $115 per share. The common stock sold recently at $295 per share, which would indicate an equity following the preferred stock of over $24,000,000.

"The company since its organization has been under the present successful management."

We recommend this preferred stock for investment.

Price per share, $99 and accrued dividend.

Temporary negotiable receipts of Lee, Higginson & Co. will be ready for delivery on or about August 5, 1919, exchangeable for stock certificates carrying dividends from August 2, 1919.

All legal details in connection with this issue will be passed upon by Messrs. Winston, Strawn & Shaw, Chicago, for the bankers, and by James M. Gray, Esq., Chicago, for the company. Books of the company have been audited regularly by Messrs. Haskins & Sells, certified public accountants.

The statements contained herein are not guaranteed, but are based upon information and advice which we believe to be accurate and reliable.

DEAR SIRS: In connection with the proposed new issue of $7,200,000 6 per cent cumulative preferred stock of the Quaker Oats Co., I submit the following information:

ORGANIZATION AND BUSINESS.

The Quaker Oats Co. was incorporated September 21, 1901, under the laws of New Jersey, and later succeeded the American Cereal Co., some of whose predecessors date back to 1854. In 1911 it purchased the Great Western Cereal Co.'s plants at Fort Dodge, Iowa, and Joliet, Ill. The company owns all the stock of Quaker Oats (Ltd.), London, distributing agent for Great Britain.

To-day the Quaker Oats Co. is the largest manufacturer in the world of oatmeal, rolled oats, corn meals, hominy, barley, and similar cereal food products, and of commercial mixed feeds for horses, mules, cattle, dairy cows, hogs, and other animals, and poultry and has also a very large flour-milling business. It owns the sole rights to the manufacture of puffed cereals and is the maker of "Puffed rice," "Puffed wheat," and "Corn puffs." It also makes the new patented product known as "Two Minute Oat Food." Recently it has begun the manufacture of macaroni and spaghetti. Products are manufactured from nearly every cereal grown and marketed throughout the world under widely advertised brands, chiefly the well-known "Quaker," "Schumacher," and "Mother's" trade names. Sales are made almost exclusively to wholesalers, reducing to a negligible amount losses from bad debts.

The company since its organization has been continuously under the present successful management.

PURPOSE OF ISSUE.

In recent years large amounts have been taken from earnings to pay for land, buildings, and machinery. Since 1906 the company has expended in capital investment $12,000,000 without creating any mortgage debt and with the sale of only $2,000,000 preferred stock. Gross sales have greatly expanded, requiring heavy increases in working capital and making it advisable to retain for operating purposes as large a portion as possible of earnings. The proceeds of this $7,200,000 preferred stock and $750,000 new common stock will be used, therefore, to reduce floating indebtedness incurred in part for plant account, thus increasing working capital and further strengthening the financial position of the company.

Capitalization upon completion of the present financing and as authorized by the stockholders at a special meeting July 12, 1919.

	Authorized.	Outstanding.
Preferred stock	$25,000,000	$18,000,000
Common stock	25,000,000	9,000,000

The company has no funded debt.

In 1916 and 1917 the preferred stock sold on the Chicago Stock Exchange up to $115 per share, while the common stock in 1916 sold up to $363 per share. The common stock sold recently at $295, which would indicate an equity following the preferred stock of over $24,000,000.

DIVIDENDS.

Regular dividends of 6 per cent per annum have been paid on the preferred stock since organization of the company. Dividends on the common stock have been paid regularly, beginning October 15, 1906, as follows:

Year.	Regular.	Extra.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
1906 (last quarter)	1½	½
1907	6	2
1908	6	2
1912	10	.....
1913	10	.....
1914	10	.....
1915	10	.....
1916	10	.....
1917	10½	.....
1919 (6 months)	6	2

GROSS SURPLUS AND DISTRIBUTION.

For the 10 years ending December 31, 1918, gross surplus and distribution thereof have been as follows:

Calendar year.	Gross surplus after taxes.	Depreciation.	Available for dividends.	Preferred dividends.	Surplus after common dividends.
1909	$1,537,105	$162,028	$1,375,077	$524,205	$493,272
1910	1,401,117	176,774	1,224,343	540,000	244,343
1911	1,977,973	197,877	1,780,096	540,000	740,096
1912	2,429,051	213,656	2,215,395	540,000	1,175,395
1913	2,287,011	235,584	2,051,426	540,000	761,534
1914	2,367,252	267,603	2,099,649	540,000	809,669
1915	3,724,223	293,511	3,430,712	540,000	2,140,730

[1] After property loss of $471,399. [2] After deducting Federal taxes.

During these 10 years the average annual earnings available for dividends were over four and three-fourths times the dividend requirements on the preferred stock then outstanding.

Net earnings, 1918, after depreciation but before deducting Federal taxes, were $6,407,760, or nearly six times dividend requirements on the entire present preferred stock, including this issue. After deducting Federal taxes, net available for dividends, 1918, was $3,502,589, and for the last five years has averaged $3,509,188, or more than three and two-tenths times this requirement. These figures make no allowance for saving in interest charges on indebtedness to be retired.

During the 10 years under review $13,301,467 was carried to surplus. This amount, put back into the business out of earnings, exceeds the total of $12,419,411 paid to stockholders in preferred and common dividends during this period. From organization to December 31, 1918, $15,349,909 was thus reinvested in the business out of earnings, equal to more than 85 per cent of the entire preferred stock outstanding, including this issue.

General balance sheet, December 31, 1918.

Applying proceeds of the present and recent financing to the above statement reduces notes payable to $12,266,700. In this connection it should be noted that the December balance sheet invariably reflects almost the highest point of the seasonal fluctuations in bank borrowing. As of to-day, these notes payable would be further reduced to $4,800,000, and of this amount $1,900,000 is represented by investment in war bonds.

Eliminating all valuation for trade-marks, trade rights, patents, and good will, and applying the proceeds of subsequent and present financing to reduce floating indebtedness, net tangible assets applicable to the $18,000,000 preferred stock, based upon the above balance sheet, are in excess of $31,000,000. This is after deducting all prior liabilities and reserves of every character.

Plant and real estate figures are based upon a valuation made in 1906 plus actual expenditures since, less adequate depreciation. Plants have been maintained in splendid condition and a valuation on present prices would be far above the book value.

Books of the company have been audited regularly by Messrs. Haskins & Sells, certified public accountants, and the above statements of earnings and financial condition are based upon their audits.

PROPERTIES.

The company owns and operates plants for the production of cereal food products at Akron, Ohio; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Fort Dodge, Iowa; Battle Creek, Mich.; Tecumseh, Mich.; Peterborough, Ontario; London, Ontario; Neepawa, Manitoba; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; and, until the outbreak of the war, Hamburg, Germany. Some of these plants also produce commercial mixed feed. Plants for the production of feed alone are operated at Morris, Ill., and Richford, Vt. Flour mills are owned and operated at Akron, Ohio; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Peterborough, Ontario, and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. Macaroni and spaghetti are manufactured at Tecumseh, Mich. In addition the company owns and operates 59 country elevators, situated at various points through the grain-producing States and western Canada; a veneer box board plant at Foxworth, Miss; and a strawboard plant at Pekin, Ill.

All plants are modern and well built, mostly of steel and concrete construction, and equipped with the latest improvements in milling machinery. The Cedar Rapids mill is the largest general cereal food plant in the world; the Akron and Peterborough mills are the second and third largest.

The company has 49 sales offices in the United States and Canada.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PREFERRED STOCK.

The essential preferences of the preferred stock, as more fully set forth in the charter, are as follows:

Preferred as to 6 per cent cumulative dividends, payable half yearly, but in practice paid quarterly on the last days of February, May, August, and November.

No dividends on the common stock may be paid in any year until after the dividends on the preferred stock for that year have been actually paid or set apart.

Preferred as to assets. In the event of dissolution of the company, the preferred stock will be entitled to $100 per share before any payment is made on the common stock.

No mortgage or charge on real estate or fixed plant (other than by way of purchase money obligations) can be created without the assent of a majority of both preferred and common stockholders.

No increase or decrease in the authorized amount of preferred stock may be made without two-thirds vote of the holders thereof.

Voting power. The preferred stock has equal voting power with the common stock in the event that any half yearly dividend thereon should be in arrears for a period of three months and until such arrears are made up.

Yours, very truly,

H. P. CROWELL,
President.

FOUR MILLION THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS.—THE AMALGAMATED SUGAR CO. 8 PER CENT CUMULATIVE SINKING FUND FIRST PREFERRED STOCK.

Dividends payable quarterly, February 1, May 1, August 1, November 1.

Redeemable in whole or in part at the option of the company on any dividend date at $120 per share and accrued dividends upon 60 days' notice. Bankers' Trust Co., New York, transfer agent. The Liberty National Bank of New York, registrar.

The following information is summarized from a letter of Mr. David C. Eccles, vice president of the company, copy of which appears on the following pages, to which reference is made.

CAPITALIZATION.

Capitalization after giving effect to the new financing.

	Authorized.	Outstanding.
8 per cent cumulative sinking fund first preferred stock	$5,000,000	$5,000,000
Common stock	25,000,000	6,824,400

HISTORY AND PROPERTIES.

The company is one of the important beet-sugar producers of the United States, and, through some of its constituent companies, has successfully operated for 20 years. It owns and operates eight factories in Utah and Idaho, with an aggregate daily capacity of 5,400 tons of beets, or 1,188,000 pounds of sugar.

PURPOSE OF ISSUE.

The proceeds of this issue of preferred stock, together with $1,000,000 additional common stock, which has been recently sold at par, has been used to retire all of the bonds and to provide for the retirement of the previously issued preferred stock of the company and to add to its working capital.

PRODUCTION.

The company's production of sugar has increased from 81,727,500 pounds in 1915 to 112,326,700 pounds in 1919.

EARNINGS.

Annual net income of the company, after payment of all taxes, including Federal taxes, for the last five years ended February 28, 1919, available for dividends averaged $1,485,000, and for the last three years averaged $1,608,000. Dividend requirements of the $5,000,000 preferred stock are $400,000 per annum.

ASSETS.

After giving effect to the new financing, net current assets of the company as of February 28, 1919, were $5,020,000 and total net assets were $13,366,000, against which this $5,000,000 of preferred stock would be a first charge.

SINKING FUND.

An annual cumulative sinking fund is to be provided sufficient in amount to retire at $120 per share 2 per cent of the amount of preferred stock then outstanding.

PREFERRED STOCK PROVISIONS.

No mortgage, except purchase-money mortgages to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost of new property acquired, may be placed upon any of the property of the company without the consent of 75 per cent in amount of the preferred stock then outstanding, nor, without similar consent, may any other indebtedness be created, except customary borrowings of not exceeding one year in maturity, made in the ordinary course of the company's business.

No additional stock equal or prior to this issue may be issued without the consent of 75 per cent in amount of the preferred stock then outstanding, and then only if the average net earnings of the company applicable to dividends for the three preceding fiscal years equal three times the amount required to pay dividends on the preferred stock then outstanding, including that to be issued.

The company agrees to maintain at all times net current assets equal to at least 60 per cent of the amount of then outstanding preferred stock.

The company's accounts have been examined by Messrs. Thompson & Black, New York City, who have certified as to the correctness of the company's financial statements herein contained.

The legality of the issue has been approved by Messrs. White & Case, New York City, for the bankers, and by Messrs. Howat, Marshall, Macmillan & Nebeker, Salt Lake City, for the company.

Price, 102½ and accrued dividend, yielding over 7¾ per cent.

The statements herein contained are not guaranteed, but have been obtained from sources which we believe to be reliable.

THE AMALGAMATED SUGAR CO.,
Ogden, Utah, August 5, 1919.

Messrs. HAYDEN, STONE & CO.,
Messrs. MONTGOMERY & CO.,
New York.

GENTLEMEN: I take pleasure in giving you the following information in connection with the $5,000,000 8 per cent cumulative sinking fund first preferred stock of the Amalgamated Sugar Co.

HISTORY AND PROPERTIES.

The Amalgamated Sugar Co., which is one of the important beet-sugar producers of the United States, was incorporated in Utah in 1915, through the acquisition and consolidation of several companies, some of which have been in successful operation for 20 years.

The company owns and operates eight sugar factories, five of which are located in northern Utah and three in southern Idaho. In general, the factories are of modern fireproof construction, equipped with up-to-date apparatus and are in good condition and have been well maintained. The territory which they serve is admirably adapted to the growing of sugar beets and the factories are well located to handle the beet crop of the districts. Their aggregate daily capacity is about 5,400 tons of beets, or 1,188,000 pounds of sugar.

PURPOSE OF ISSUE.

Sufficient of the proceeds of this issue of preferred stock, together with $1,000,000 additional common stock, which has been recently sold at par, has been used to pay off the first mortgage 7 per cent serial convertible gold bonds of the company, which were retired on August 1, 1919, thereby eliminating the only bonded debt of the company, and will be used to retire all of the company's preferred stock of another issue and now outstanding, amounting to approximately $245,300. The balance of the proceeds of these stock issues has ben added to the company's working capital.

PROVISIONS OF THE PREFERRED STOCK.

Some of the more important provisions of the preferred stock are substantially as follows:

The preferred stock is entitled to cumulative dividends at the rate of 8 per cent per annum before any dividends are paid upon the common stock, and is preferred over the common stock as to assets in case of liquidation.

No mortgage, except purchase-money mortgages to the extent of 75 per cent of the cost of new property acquired, may be placed upon any of the property of the company without the consent of 75 per cent in amount of the preferred stock then outstanding, nor without similar consent may any other indebtedness be created except customary borrowings of not exceeding one year in maturity, made in the ordinary course of the company's business.

No additional stock equal or prior to this issue may be issued without the consent of 75 per cent in amount of the preferred stock then outstanding, and then only if the average net earnings of the company applicable to dividends for the three preceding fiscal years equal three times the amount required to pay dividends on the preferred stock then outstanding, including that to be issued.

An annual cumulative sinking fund is to be provided in amount sufficient to retire at $120 per share 2 per cent of the amount of preferred stock then outstanding.

The company agrees to maintain at all times net current assets equal to at least 60 per cent of the amount of the then outstanding preferred stock.

PRODUCTION.

The company's production of sugar during the last five years has shown constant increase, as appears from the following statement:

Production for years ended Feb. 28.	Pounds.
1915	81,727,500
1916	91,187,600
1917	92,451,600
1918	93,987,900
1919	112,326,700

EARNINGS.

The average annual net income of the company, after the deduction of all taxes, including Federal taxes, for the five years ended February 28, 1919, available for dividends, was $1,485,000. For the last three years of this period the average annual amount available for dividends was $1,608,000. The amount required to pay dividends on the $5,000,000 preferred stock is $400,000 per annum.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The capitalization of the company, after giving effect to the new financing, will be as follows:

	Authorized.	Outstanding.
8 per cent cumulative sinking fund first preferred stock[1]	$5,000,000	$5,000,000
Common stock	25,000,000	6,824,400

[1] $245,300 preferred stock of an issue previously made and at present outstanding is not included in this statement, as all of this stock will be called for redemption and funds for its retirement at $110 per share and accrued dividends have been deposited with Bankers Trust Co., and proper corporate action will be taken by the company so that its capitalization will conform to the statements herein.

A condensed balance sheet of the company as of February 28, 1919, after giving effect to the new financing, is as follows:

ASSETS.

Factory investment (net after depreciation)		$8,418,097
Other permanent investments		378,020
Current assets:
Cash, Liberty bonds, etc	$2,295,137

ASSETS.

The net current assets of the company as of February 28, 1919, after giving effect to the new financing, amount to $5,020,000, and the total net assets, against which the preferred stock would be a first charge, amount to $13,366,000, or $267 per share on the preferred stock.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) DAVID C. ECCLES,
Vice President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the high cost of living is one of the great subjects under consideration at the present time, and, as I have not placed anything into the RECORD for a long time on that subject from the farmer's standpoint, I am going to ask the permission of the Senate to read a short article from the New York Times of this morning. The article is headed:

Farmers' profit in an $11 dinner just 82 cents, delegates who ate it tell the President—Argue for producers—Western men say profiteering, labor conditions, and extravagance cause high prices.

I desire to say to Senators that there is more philosophy and good common sense in the brief statement presented by the western farmers to the President upon the real conditions that cause the high cost of living than we would ordinarily get from all of the departments of the Government after months spent in preparing reports to the Senate and to the House of Representatives in answer to our queries. The article reads:

[Special to the New York Times.]

WASHINGTON, August 14.

The farmers of the Nation, as represented by delegates of the National Federation of State Farm Bureaus, laid their side of the high cost of living problem before President Wilson to-day, asserting that high prices were not caused by the rapacity of producers, but by a combination of causes, including profiteering and speculation by the middleman, extravagance by the public, strikes, and stagnation in the production of manufactured goods and prepared foodstuffs.

The delegates, from bureaus in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, were with the President for nearly an hour, and were apparently well satisfied with the result of their interview. They urged the President to let wheat alone, and stated that he had said the Government was not disposed at this time to interfere with the price of wheat. He added, they said, that he was working out a solution of the problem entirely along the lines which he had suggested in his address to Congress.

The farmers had prepared a statement which dealt in some detail with their viewpoint, and emphasized that it was essential that they should know what the future held in store for them, as the time had come when they must plan for the 1920 harvest.

In presenting their argument the delegates cited their dinner at what they described as a "modest hotel" in Washington to illustrate their contention that profiteering is being carried on by agencies between the producer and the ultimate consumer. Five of them paid $11 for a none too elaborate dinner, exclusive of tips. Their figures showed that of the $11, 82 cents had gone to the farmers who produced the food.

I only interrupt the reading of this article here to state that it certainly was a very modest hotel in the city of Washington in which five men got a dinner for $11. If they got it for less than $15 at some of our hotels, they would be doing exceedingly well. The article continues:

"Food on the table costs out of all proportion to the price to the producer," they told the President. Part of this is due to the short hours and high wages of labor—

That is something which we very often forget to suggest, especially to the laborers who are asking that their wages may be increased so that they may meet the high cost of living which their wages make, the article continuing—part to the exorbitant prices of the several middlemen between the producer and the consumer—

We have all recognized that for many years—and a considerable part to the extravagant practices of the consumer in purchasing.

We have to a great extent lost our economic ability in the matter of purchasing. We never ask whether we can get something a little cheaper at some other place, but we simply pick up the telephone and order our steak and our coffee, and at the end of the month we pay our bill. We have nothing whatever to say as to what the charges will be. A great deal of the trouble, then, as is suggested here by the farmers, grows out of the extravagant practices of the consumer in connection with purchasing. This article further reads:

Without going into an analysis of who gets it, compare the difference in price of choice beef on the hoof at 18 cents per pound with that of a moderate meal for five at one of Washington's modest hotels, the meal consisting—

Now, let us see of what this dinner consisted—of steak, potatoes, corn, bread and butter, and coffee, and costing $11.

There was no dessert or fruit of any kind—

Of this $11 the producer of the food, the farmer, got about as follows:

82 CENTS FOR THE FARMER.

Beef, 2 pounds, 36 cents; potatoes, 13 cents; bread, 2 cents; butter, 7 cents; coffee, cream, and sugar, 4 cents; corn, 20 cents, making a total of 82 cents. This is about 7 per cent of the total.

Now, it is proposed—and that is about all we hear from the labor unions and others—to cut down by 50 per cent the farmers' price on the 7 per cent, so they might get their meals 3½ per cent cheaper than they otherwise would out of this $11.

A 50 per cent reduction in the price of these products to the producer would have lessened the total cost of the whole meal on the hotel table only 41 cents, smaller by half than the customary 10 per cent tip, which, by the way, is not included in the above price for the meal.

I assume the 10 per cent tip, therefore, in this case would be $1, making their meal cost them $12 instead of $11.

This illustration shows the extremes of exhorbitant profits of the middlemen and of extravagant practices of the consumers in purchasing, including probably all the evils that are contributing in large measure to the high cost of living to the consumer. A reduction to the producer in the price of these foodstuffs to a point which would stagnate production of grains and meats, would have an inconsequential effect upon final prices to the consumer."

The five delegates who ate the $11 dinner were J. C. Crocker, president of the Nebraska Farm Bureau; O. E. Bradfute, president of the Ohio bureau; J. G. Brown, president of the Indiana bureau; J. R. Howard, president of the Iowa bureau; and D. O. Thompson, secretary of the Illinois bureau.

"The high cost of living," asserted the committee, "is not due to the original price of the farm products to the grower. The Government minimum price on wheat does not determine the cost of a loaf of bread.

We have demonstrated that very many times—

"Fixing a resale price at $1.50 per bushel would affect very little, if reflected to the consumer, the cost of living for the average family."

I ask Senators to bear this also in mind:

The high cost of living is not due to the storage of meats, vegetables, fruits, eggs, and poultry in the season when these are produced in surplus against the season of short supply. Food storage for speculative purposes is intolerable.

The high cost of living is not due to exportation of food and clothing any more than it is due to our heavy exports of manufactured goods, machinery, etc., of which the farmer is a heavy purchaser. An embargo on foodstuffs to bring down the high cost of living will be as demoralizing to American agriculture as the embargo placed on foodstuffs was to French agriculture in the time of Louis XIV.

LACK OF PRIVATE ECONOMIES.

Moreover, the high cost of living is not merely a local or national consideration. It is a world matter. Applying a first-aid remedy at home to create and foster anarchy and revolution abroad should not be the policy of the United States, even at this critical juncture.

This question of lack of economy in public spending was brought within the focus of the American public's attention early in July, when the railway brotherhoods demanded of President Wilson that he bring down the cost of living immediately, threatening a demand in wage increase amounting to a total of $800,000,000 a year, payable necessarily from one of two sources, revenues from increase of freight rates or from a deficiency appropriation, either of which would add to the cost of living.

In other words, the brotherhoods ask for an increase of $800,000,000 in wages, which must be immediately charged back to the farmers and other producers in order to bring down the cost of living. The article continues:

A lack of practicing economies in private life may be illustrated without end. Theaters and places of amusement, resorts, and watering places are crowded with beautifully gowned women and handsomely tailored men. The price of shoe shines has doubled and trebled, yet one must wait his turn, though he could shine his own shoes at home for less than 1 cent. So illustrations might be multiplied, all showing that lack of practicing plain economy is a great contributing factor in maintaining the high cost of living.

The high cost of living is due to shifting individual responsibility for the present state of affairs and each component of the people of the Nation seeking self-satisfaction rather than the answer to the great world question. This is our national state of mind. Instead of doing our national and individual best to produce more goods, so that there will be enough for all at a reasonable price, each is trying to better his condition at the expense of the other fellow.

The high cost of living is not due to lack of desire or effort on the part of the farmers to produce to the limit of their physical ability. Following a beautiful promise of a bountiful wheat harvest, a most destructive attack of scab and rust cut the wheat yield very materially. Untimely heat and drought shortened the oats crop and adversely affected the corn crop. The long hours and strenuous diligence of the farm operation have, in spite of these adverse circumstances, put the crop across. The farmer has not struck, walked out, or otherwise slackened in production.

The high cost of living is due to a stagnation in production of manufactured goods and prepared foodstuffs. Every labor strike that shuts down any plant engaged in the preparation of foods or the making of clothing, that shuts down a mine or a mill, adds to the high cost of living. Shortly after a strike of the United States yards and packing-plant employees the wholesale price of fresh meats advanced 15 to 35 per cent, directly due to the short kill and consequent small supply of fresh meats.

REFUSES TO WORK ALONE.

The American farmer does not sympathize with artificial or political quackery for befogging the real issues, which is impotent to give even passing relief. The American farmer is willing to squarely meet the issue. If prices are cut to the bone all along the line, farm products, wages, manufactured goods, rents, wholesalers' and retailers' profits, will bring the desired result, which he rather doubts. He will go as far along that road as any, but he will not go alone. Let the whole brotherhood of man go the full route. If increased production will clarify the situation, the American farmer will jointly, with all of his fellow citizens, buckle his belt for a most strenuous campaign of production; but here, again, he is determined that he will not work alone.

If capitalistic monopoly wants enough food produced that it may be feasted, if organized labor wants food produced that it may be fed, if the do-nothing dawdlers want enough food produced so that they may occasionally eat, let them stand forth now at this time, when the farmer must determine his 1920 food-production program, and declare by deeds—cutting out profiteering in goods and wages, going honestly to the business of preparing and purveying the necessities of life, going honestly to the job or doing a full day's work for a full day's pay—their willingness to cooperate. Failure of these forces to do this now will be a boomerang that ere the next cycle of the seasons will effect a condition of living now undreamed of.

Mr. President, this may well be taken into consideration by the American consumer to-day. I picked up the Washington Post of a few days ago, and, while we are complaining that there is a shortage of work and labor can not obtain employment, I find in that paper four or five full columns of "Help wanted" advertisements and I find three advertisements under the heading "Situations wanted." That is true of every one of the great daily papers throughout the United States. There is a demand everywhere for labor while labor is idle. Let labor go to work, let them cut out profiteering, let them do an honest day's work for an honest day's pay and increase the productive capacity of this country, and the prices and the high cost of living will come down to proper levels, and we will not need to spend hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars for investigations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business? If not the morning business is closed.

BUILDINGS ON ARLINGTON FARM.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to call up the resolution which I submitted on the last legislative day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 161, submitted by Mr. PHELAN on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to discontinue the construction of and to remove the unsightly buildings on the so-called Arlington farm on the Potomac between the Lincoln Memorial and the Arlington mansion and the new amphitheater.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to say that I had information from the Secretary of Agriculture yesterday that, anticipating that there would be some objection to the construction upon the Arlington farm of buildings which are in full view of the city of Washington, he consulted in 1917 the Fine Arts Commission, and he has a letter from Col. Harts, the secretary and executive officer of that body, giving consent. The Secretary said he was very particular in securing the consent of the Fine Arts Commission for the construction of the buildings within his jurisdiction, because he sympathized very strongly with the desire on the part of Congress to preserve the beauty of the National Capital. He conceded, however, that these buildings were a blot upon the landscape and objectionable, but stated that he had arranged to have their roofs painted with some chemical paint, camouflaged so that you could not see the roofs, although they were there, and if the chemical paint fails he agrees to plant trees, which will hide the objectionable structures; and he goes so far as to say that if the paint and the trees fail to camouflage the buildings sufficiently he will very gladly consent to the demolition of the buildings, which in themselves are not very expensive. So we can count upon the full and sympathetic support of the Secretary of Agriculture. He said that the Arlington farm came into the possession of the Agricultural Department by act of Congress transferring it from the War Department, and that he has a committee of his department on this very subject of constructing buildings without giving any artistic offense.

In view of this fact, therefore, I will ask the Chair, and make a motion to that effect, that my resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library. The Committee on the Library have always had jurisdiction over subjects of this kind, and this is not the only matter which might well engage their attention. From the heights of Arlington yesterday I looked down upon the beautiful Mall, with the Lincoln Monument just completed at a cost of two and a half million dollars, and I observed the utterly unsightly Army and Navy buildings, a mile long, which were constructed as war emergency measures at a cost of $7,000,000, destroying from an artistic point of view or from any point of view the great and beautiful memorial to the martyred President.

So I hope the committee will take jurisdiction not only of the offense committed by the Agricultural Department, which has already atoned for it, but the offense committed in the war hurry and necessity of erecting so-called temporary buildings which are a blot upon the fair face of our National Capital.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. I will not delay the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is anxious to get the floor. How near completion are these buildings to which the Senator objects?

Mr. PHELAN. They are practically all completed. The last building, with the offensive roof, is a chemical building, and it is built high in order to gather the fumes of the chemicals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the purpose for which they are to be used?

Mr. PHELAN. In the conduct of the experimental farm. The particular building that has given offense is the chemical building, as I have explained.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are there any stables?

Mr. PHELAN. I think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator, in conversation, to say that they were barns, or something of the kind.

Mr. PHELAN. They are barns, so far as the eye of the observer goes. I have not inspected them at close range; but it is sufficient to say that they are barns when you look at them. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8362. An act to amend and revise the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Printing.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not at all sure that anything I may have to say on the high cost of living, its causes or remedy, will very greatly interest either the Senate or the country. I am impelled, nevertheless, to take the floor for the purpose of contributing as far as I am able my mite to the solution of this great question.

By way of preliminary, I want to say that I have no possible sympathy with the profiteer. Indeed, I believe no decent man can have any sympathy with one who indulges in extortionate practices at a time like this. But, Mr. President, this is an hour when calm investigation, patient research, and temperate conduct ought to rule. The worst thing in the world to do in a time of emergency is to grow excited. An excited man very seldom gets the best result of which he is capable. Temporary and haphazard remedies very often kill the patient, when he would get well if he were left alone and if nature were permitted to take its course.

The country to-day is still suffering from shell shock. Hardly anyone is in a normal state of mind. No line of business is in a normal condition. A great storm has swept over the intellectual world and its ravages and disturbances still exist. A great upheaval has torn and rent the physical world, and the effects are not only felt to-day but they will be felt a hundred years from this hour. The man who comes forward with a cure-all for these conditions is very likely to find that his cure does not work.

So I approach this question with a feeling of considerable modesty, well understanding that I do not possess the wisdom which will enable me to produce some magical remedy for ills that have their roots in physical conditions, and that can be remedied only by time and by the labor of the world.

Let us therefore indulge calmness, and let us refuse to be rushed into panic. Frequently, Mr. President, agitation brings the very evil it seeks to remedy. The best way to cause a run on a bank is to discuss the question whether the bank will be able to pay out. Let that sort of discussion go on in a community for 24 hours and there will be a line of depositors at the paying teller's window demanding their money. Let an agitation go forth that there is a great scarcity of some particular prime necessity of life that everybody must have and the almost inevitable result is a mounting of prices.

The reasons for that are many, and could be elucidated at great length; but I merely make a general statement, knowing that the experience of Senators makes argument unnecessary. Convince all the world that there is a shortage in some particular thing, and everybody in the world will begin to want to hold what he has and to acquire more. Convince the people of the world that the supply will soon be sufficient, and immediately there will be a relaxation on the part of those who want to hold and to make money. I have not the slightest doubt to-day that if the whole world could be convinced to-morrow morning that the supply of necessities would soon equal the demand, there would be a lowering of the market day after to-morrow of a most pronounced character.

I have heard discussions of the causes for high prices. One person thinks the cause is found in the selfishness of the profiteer. I admit that that is a contributing cause, in some instances a very aggravating cause; but it is not one of the principal causes, in my judgment. Another individual thinks that if you would open all the cold-storage houses of the country and suddenly dump upon the market their contents, you would cure high prices. I grant you that you would break prices for a few days; but, in my opinion, if you were to pursue this policy, unless you did it very temperately and very moderately, you would pay dearly for it next winter. Another sees a remedy in the passage of drastic laws and in the indictment of nearly every man, woman, and child engaged in trade in the United States. I grant you that there are some of these people who ought to be punished; but, again, I do not regard this as the principal cause of high prices.

I want to call attention to some things which I believe can be demonstrated to be the great underlying causes of the present high cost of living, and if we could get at the truth—not the fancies, not the ravings, of men—regarding the actual conditions of the world, we would then be in a position to consider the proper remedies to apply; and with the application of any proper remedy I shall be in hearty accord.

There are two great principles in economics and finance which can not be disregarded and which no amount of legislation can effectively control. These principles lie at the basis of all prices, and, while there may be disturbing or interfering forces which, to some extent, qualify their operation, they nevertheless work with a consistent, irresistible, and controlling force.

First. Whenever the demand for any great necessity materially exceeds the supply, an increase in price is inevitable. Conversely, when the supply exceeds the demand, a decrease in price follows.

The latter condition may be temporarily effected by combinations artificially withholding the supply and controlling the market. But neither combination of men nor decrees of government have ever transmuted deficiency into plenty or satisfied human longings for a necessity which can not be obtained. Neither have they been able under such circumstances to keep prices from advancing.

Second. A radical increase in the number of dollars in circulation results in a decrease in the purchasing power of the dollar. In other words, if the value of dollars is low the price measured by dollars will be high.

When there is a small per capita circulation, money is difficult to get. Therefore a small amount of money will purchase a given commodity. If, however, the amount of money in circulation is doubled, then money is more easily obtained and a larger amount will be required to purchase the same article. That is to say, a scarcity of money means that money has a high purchasing power. A plethora of money means that money has a low value and therefore a low purchasing power. Stated in a sentence, a small circulating medium results in low prices measured by dollars; an excessive circulation means high prices measured by dollars.

Let us apply these two great laws to present conditions and ascertain to what extent they may be responsible for present prices. By intelligently examining the fact we may be able to disabuse our minds of many prejudices and at the same time discover the futility of some of the remedies proposed.

Referring to the first proposition, it must be admitted that if production has fallen behind consumption, so that there is a demand greater than can be supplied, then the excess of prices due to such underproduction and overdemand can only be met by bringing consumption up to production. We must remove the cause to secure the remedy.

Is there a condition of underproduction? Is the world actually in need of a great number of necessaries which it is impossible to immediately supply? If so, then the remedy must be found in increased production. Any device, plan, or scheme, therefore, which will have a tendency to lessen production, to discourage enterprise, or to arrest industry will, instead of bringing lower prices, increase present excessive prices by increasing their primary cause, namely, underproduction.

Let us examine the facts calmly, dispassionately, and without prejudice.

First, in normal times the world consumes each year substantially all that has been produced. I wish Senators would let that thought, that fact, a very old one, sink in.

If the entire world were to fail for a single year to raise a crop, the world would starve to death. If all manufacturing industries were to cease operation for 12 months' time, half the world would be without clothing and shoes or other prime necessities.

These facts serve to illustrate the truth that in normal times consumption constantly treads upon the heels of production.

If each month there were to be manufactured 10 per cent more shoes than are used, there would shortly be accumulated a surplus which would break the market and completely destroy values.

If, upon the other hand, there were a deficiency in production of shoes equal to 10 per cent each month, at the end of 12 months one-twelfth of the people would be without sufficient shoes to supply them. At least, there would be a general deficiency and clamor for shoes. Consequently, prices would increase, for dealers would bid against dealers for the shoes with which to supply their customers.

Take a very simple illustration. If two men each need a hundred horses and there are only 50 horses to be purchased, each of these men will pay high prices in order to secure as many horses as possible. But if there be 300 horses in the market, the sellers will be cutting prices in order to unload, and the buyers can take their pick.

All this is elementary and obvious, but in a crisis like that which now confronts us we are likely to overlook even the obvious.

Let us apply these plain facts to present conditions.

Five years ago Europe withdrew from industrial production over 20,000,000 men. She massed them in camps, where they became consumers instead of producers. She marshaled them on the fields of battle, where they were engaged in the work of destruction instead of the work of creation. The energies of the world were at once taxed to sustain this vast aggregation of consumers and destroyers. From the Arctic to the Antarctic Circles, the round world was combed for everything necessary to sustain the military operations. Not only were millions of farmers withdrawn from the fields and placed in military camps but the supplies which other millions of farmers raised were sent to these military camps and to the armies in Europe. The factories of the world were to a large extent changed from instrumentalities for the making of useful tools and implements of manufacture and recreation into concerns engaged in the making of supplies which were speedily to be destroyed in the great conflict. It is scarcely too much to say that for five years' time production of all the great necessities of life has been limited merely to the supplying of what was actually and grievously necessary.

More than two years ago our own country was drawn into the conflict. First and last, we withdrew from the useful pursuits over 4,000,000 men. We turned the energies of millions of our civilian population into the production of war supplies. We sent armies of workmen into the forests. We seized control of the great steel and iron mills and all classes of factories and shops. We utilized their products in the building, not of homes and cities, but in constructing great military camps and ships which were to take the place of those destroyed by war. We sent abroad immeasurable supplies of every kind. We reproduced here on a gigantic scale all that had been done in Europe, and here, as there, we robbed the accumulations of the past in order to supply the present. We allowed railroads, machine shops, every kind of industrial enterprise to languish in order to devote our energies to the great conflict.

Almost immediately there began to exist a gap between production and consumption. Just as that gap widened prices advanced, and continued to advance. It was the natural law of supply and demand working itself out in prices. It was the natural law of supply and demand measured by dollars.

A raise in the price of one article frequently forces an advance in the prices of fifty or a hundred other products into which the primary article enters.

I am now discussing general principles, and in the illustrations which I use am disregarding interfering causes.

Let us take coal as a sample case. In 1914, 1915, and 1916 the European war increased vastly the demand for American manufactured goods. This made a corresponding increase in coal consumption. The demand for coal for the first time in many years far exceeded the then capacity of the mines to produce. The manufacturers began bidding against each other for coal. The proprietor of the coal mine first made slight advances, but when the demand reached a point beyond the capacity of his normal forces and he was confronted with a proposition of expending money for additional machinery and additional men at higher wages, he naturally advanced the price of coal.

I am not now discussing the question of whether there were combinations or whether there was unreasonable speculation. I am considering alone the basic fact that an increased demand for coal meant an increased price. The increased wages paid the coal miner meant an increased price. The increased price of coal meant an additional price for every article in the production of which coal was employed as a power producer. Steel, copper, lead, zinc, railroad supplies, buildings, bridges, everything into which steel or iron entered found an additional charge laid upon it.

What is said of these articles is true of every other commodity.

Each increase of price in any of the necessities correspondingly increased the cost of living to all of the people of the United States.

Here I pause to make a remark, the substance of which is often too generally disregarded.

We are eternally talking about consumers as though they were a small or particular class of the people. We are likewise talking about producers as though they were a small or particular class of people.

There is no greater mistake than the assumption that the people are divided into two classes—consumers and producers. We are all consumers. Every man, woman, and child in the United States is a consumer. Each advance of price, therefore, falls upon every citizen of the country.

So also it may be said almost without qualification that all of the people of the United States are to a greater or less extent producers. Even the so-called idle rich are producers in the sense that their capital is engaged in production.

It follows, therefore, speaking broadly, that the burdens of high prices are borne by the public at large, and that the benefit of high prices flows back to the public at large. Of course, I do not claim that the distribution is equitable. That is an entirely different question. But it is hard to think of any class of people, except those working upon fixed salaries or living upon fixed incomes, who have not to some extent had the burden of high prices mitigated by an increase of profits, incomes, or wages.

Thus far I have undertaken to show by mere process of reason that there is in this country a great gap between production and consumption; that this is due to the withdrawal from industrial activities of millions of men; and that this shortage in production naturally worked an advance in prices.

But we have been confronted by the fact that the necessities of Europe have been greater than ours. Consequently there has been an enormous suction created in Europe, drawing from this country not the normal European shipments, but an abnormal and wholly unprecedented drain has been laid upon our resources. By this means price conditions and shortages here have been magnified.

An interesting feature is that the American people have themselves furnished a great part of the money to Europe with which Europe purchased our supplies and transported them to her shores. We loaned Europe, first and last, $10,000,000,000, approximately. Nearly all of this money was used to buy American cereals, cotton, leather, steel, and all other conceivable necessaries of life. Our stocks were just to that extent depleted.

If I am a farmer and loan my neighbor a thousand dollars with which to purchase horses and then sell him all the horses I have on my farm for a thousand dollars, I need not be surprised if I am short of horses, although I may have a perfectly good promissory note in my pocket.

This exactly illustrates what we have been doing.

We loan Europe ten thousand millions of dollars and then insist that Europe shall buy from us ten thousand million dollars' worth of American products. This she does, and we ship to her ten thousand million dollars' worth of breadstuffs, meats, clothing, steel, coal, and the other prime necessities of life. Having in this way depleted our larder and our stores, we express surprise when we are confronted with a shortage.

History records the fact that "Old Mother Hubbard went to the cupboard to get her poor dog a bone" and found the cupboard bare. The chronicler does not tell us, however, whether the old lady had fed all the bones to the dog in the adjoining yard the night before; but if she had, and possessed common sense, she would not have been greatly surprised when she found there was nothing with which to feed her own Fido.

Right here you find an additional key to the question of high prices. Nearly everything we shipped to Europe was sold for the highest prices imaginable. There was an exception to that in those products which were controlled by the United States Grain Corporation, but that is a chapter by itself.

It operated against the farmer, as it was intended to operate, but as to nearly all other American products the European prices paid were very high. The price of the surplus shipped abroad always—in the absence of artificial interference—fixes the price of the product at home.

Thus far I have dealt with these questions in the abstract. I now present certain tables compiled from official reports which illustrate and fortify the argument by concrete example.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. One moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to ask a question of the Senator.

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I desired to ask if he had made any examination into the prices of commodities during the Civil War and their increase from the beginning of that war until its close, as compared with the prices of the same commodities at the beginning of this war and on the 1st day of January of this year?

Mr. REED. I have not made that comparison, but I have no doubt it is very interesting.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator now that when that comparison is exhibited to the country people will be greatly surprised. I have now in my office a comparison of the prices of 90 commodities on the 1st day of January, 1862, and the prices of those commodities at the time of the close of the Civil War. I have also the prices of the same commodities in the United States on the 1st day of January, 1915, and their price on the 1st day of January, 1918. I repeat, the American people will be surprised to learn that the rate of increase upon those 90 commodities runs, during the present World War, almost exactly parallel to the rate of increase during the Civil War.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt the Senator from Utah has a most interesting compilation, but that is a comparison into which I have not gone. I know the Senate will be interested in his figures when he presents them. However, we all know that there has never in history been a war of any magnitude which has not advanced prices.

Now, returning to my line of argument, the tables which I present show that our exports abroad have increased to such an extent as to drain this country not only of its surplus but of those things which are necessary for consumption at home. I call attention to a few specific items selected out of a great number, because they are typical. I am going to read this table, for it is very short, and I ask Senators to pay me the compliment of remaining in the Chamber to attend to the figures which it presents.

In 1914 we exported of breadstuffs to Europe, in round numbers, $165,000,000 worth; in 1915, $573,000,000; in 1916, $435,000,000; in 1917, $589,000,000; in 1918, $633,000,000; and in the fiscal year 1919, we exported $954,779,894 worth—approximately $1,000,000,000 worth of breadstuffs sent from this country to Europe.

I am not making any attack upon that; but if you send a thousand million dollars' worth of breadstuffs from this country to Europe, you are lacking just that amount at home, unless it be of a surplus; and in view of the fact that our shipments in 1914 were only $165,000,000 worth, that being the natural surplus, it is easy to judge whether we have drained our larder.

Shortage and high prices of breadstuffs, therefore, can be accounted for by the European drain and European prices. Men may rant and demagogues may rave, but all the ranting and all the raving in the world will never remedy a situation like that. If you have too little at home to eat and have been sending too much abroad you will have to pay too much for what you have to eat at home.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator give us the quantity as well as the amount in dollars of these exports? I take it for granted that in 1914 the price of grain was much cheaper than in 1919; so that the relative quantity is not clearly disclosed by the cost.

Mr. REED. I can not do that as to breadstuffs, which were general, and the figures as to which I obtained from statistics compiled in that way; but I will take wheat.

In 1913 we exported 142,789,596 bushels, and in 1919 we exported 287,434,087 bushels; that is to say, in 1919 we exported 144,558,491 more bushels of wheat than we did in 1913.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator tell us whether that includes the amount we used in France for feeding our own Army?

Mr. REED. No; it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is in addition to what we fed to our own Army?

Mr. REED. What we sent to our own armies is not included in these figures.

It is interesting to notice that at the same time the exports of corn, which in 1913 were 49,640,697 bushels, in 1919 dropped to 16,687,538 bushels. That pretty clearly demonstrates that Mr. Hoover made the American people eat corn while he sent the wheat to Europe—a tenderness for Europeans which is truly Hooveresque. But speaking of breadstuffs generally, the case of wheat is typical, and we sent to Europe of breadstuffs quantities so enormous as to deplete the supply in this country.

In connection with the increase in the exports of breadstuffs, prices should be considered—and I am coming to the very question to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] referred—because the price of the surplus, in the absence of artificial control, fixes the price of the whole. I present a table showing the amount received for foodstuffs shipped abroad. I shall ask permission to print the table in the RECORD, and I now simply call attention to the round figures. In 1913, of wheat and flour we shipped abroad $142,000,000 worth; in 1919, $692,000,000 worth. Of meat and dairy products, in 1913, we shipped abroad $153,000,000 worth, while in 1919—and those who complain of the high prices of meat and butter should get these figures—we shipped abroad $1,167,850,576 worth. Taking the total of all foodstuffs, including meats and dairy products, we have these figures: In 1913, when the exports, by the way, were larger than in 1914, $503,111,639, and in 1919 $2,504,895,554. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the complete table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Exports of domestic foodstuffs from the United States to foreign countries during the years ending June 30, 1913 to 1919.

[Department of Commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.]

Year ending June 30.	Wheat and wheat flour.	Other breadstuffs.	Meat and dairy products.	Other foodstuffs.	Total foodstuffs.
1913	$142,207,965	$68,890,374	$153,883,526	$138,129,774	$503,111,639
1914	142,407,631	22,894,754	146,227,780	119,183,292	430,713,457
1915	428,421,569	145,402,107	220,051,847	167,693,060	961,568,583
1916	302,870,486	132,808,837	290,899,680	253,118,250	979,697,253
1917	391,378,179	197,605,275	403,192,279	277,485,610	1,269,661,343
1918	325,663,682	307,576,174	679,835,794	215,605,026	1,528,680,676
1919	692,605,917	262,173,977	1,167,850,576	382,265,084	2,504,895,554

Mr. REED. With facts like that staring us in the face, we are squabbling about how many cucumbers somebody has in cold storage. I do not say cold storage may not have affected conditions, but get the figures; they mount from $500,000,000 to $2,500,000,000. Making the allowance for prices which must be made if we are to arrive at a fair estimate, we have this enormous drain upon the resources of the country. Furthermore, I pause to interpolate that there was an additional home demand because we had to sustain our armies abroad, and the immense wastage that came from that source, I suppose, can not even be estimated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The demand in Europe is not so great this year as it was last, and the demand for the support of our Army and Navy is not so great now as it has been. How does the Senator account for prices continuing to rise when so much of the demand has passed?

Mr. REED. In the first place, the Senator is wrong in his facts. The demand in Europe, speaking broadly, is greater right now than it has ever been. In the month of June, 1919, we shipped abroad, as I shall show you, of certain commodities more than we formerly shipped in a year; so that the Senator is wrong about that fact.

I do not wish to be diverted from my line of argument except for a moment, but as to the other fact, the present increase of prices, when the Senator says that we are not sending so much abroad to our soldiers, that is true. It is also true that the soldier having been returned to his home has not yet had the opportunity to enter into the production of commodities which have reached the market, and he is still a consumer. That is another statement which I must make in a broad and general way—that the soldier who was discharged from the Army last month and went to a farm has not as yet raised any potatoes that have reached town.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And they are all consuming just as they were during the war.

Mr. REED. And they are all consuming, as the Senator states. It takes 12 months or more for production, speaking again broadly, to pass from the producer to the consumer. These difficulties will not be found in little, trifling matters; they will be found in great world conditions, and that is the thought which I am trying, if possible, to impress. I wish to proceed now along that line.

Mr. President, I present now, without reading, a long table prepared by the Department of Commerce which shows the shipments for export of domestic breadstuffs and a great number of other articles. Comparisons are made for the years 1919 and 1918. Let me here call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that in the month of June, 1918, we shipped abroad of breadstuffs, according to the figures compiled in this table, $55,000,000 worth, and in June, 1919, $118,000,000 worth, in round numbers; that in June, 1918, we shipped abroad $77,000,000 of dairy products, and in June, 1919, the fiscal year which has just come to a close, $174,000,000 worth—I am omitting the odd figures—that in June, 1918, we shipped abroad 87,000,000 pounds of bacon, and in June, 1919, 172,000,000 pounds of bacon; in June, 1918, we shipped abroad 47,000,000 pounds of hams and shoulders, and in June, 1919, 96,000,000 pounds of hams and shoulders, and so on.

I ask permission at this point to insert in the RECORD the entire table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Adapted from "Imports of Merchandise, by Principal Articles and Principal Countries," "Monthly Summary of the Foreign Commerce of the United States," June 1915, June, 1917, Department of Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in what condition does that leave the stock on hand in America in the packers' possession and in cold storage compared with the year preceding?

Mr. REED. The stock now in cold storage in the case of many articles is slightly greater than it was at the same time in 1918, while in other articles it is lower. The reasons for that, I think, are abundant, and I believe I can show them.

I have already spoken of the fact that the shipments of necessities abroad were under artificial control—if I have not spoken of it, I will speak of it now—and that American money was used to finance the operation.

Among other things Congress appropriated $150,000,000 as the primary capital of the United States Grain Corporation. The reports of that corporation made in July, 1919, and published in the Modern Grainman, show that since its incorporation the Grain Corporation has collected $3,500,000,000 and disbursed $3,500,000,000. It has bought at first hand and sold for overseas shipment commodities to the value of $1,800,000,000 and has made a profit of $23,000,000. It therefore appears that this corporation, undertaking to control the grain market, handled a total of $3,500,000,000 worth of breadstuffs and supplies, and shipped abroad more than one-half of the entire amount it controlled. Having artificially promoted this drain upon the foods of the country it is not surprising that prices here mounted and that we are confronted by a shortage and high prices to-day.

Moreover, the policy of using Government money and American financial resources to artificially drain America of foodstuffs is prevailing at the present time. Only recently we appropriated $100,000,000 for this purpose. The money, I understand, has been used as a revolving fund. The act expressly provided that the goods must be purchased in this country. Mr. Hoover, in his address before the American Expeditionary University in France in May last, declared:

The United States Food Administration continues its existence, and through its arrangements the large purchases of food still being made in America are all centralized and controlled. Two new great organizations have been especially created—the Interallied Supreme Economic Council, with a food section presided over by the United States Food Administrator; the other, the American Relief Administration, of which the United States Food Administrator is the director general. These two new corporations have the responsibility of determining the necessities of the hungry nations of Europe and of obtaining and allocating the food supplies necessary to meet these necessities.

Nobody seems to be charged with the duty of determining the necessities of the hungry hordes of America.

He continues:

It is the feeding of all Europe that is the burden now lying on these organizations. The American Relief Administration has its representatives in all these countries to-day, and food is flowing from our shores to Poland, Serbia, Bohemia, and Roumania.

Under circumstances such as these is it remarkable that bread is high in the United States, and that ham and bacon are at a premium? And need we look for any small cause when the great one is there?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was called out of the Chamber just a moment ago when the Senator was submitting his figures. He submitted some very interesting figures about the amount of foodstuffs that had gone to Europe. Has the Senator any figures that will show the supply of foodstuffs on hand for June or July, 1918, and June or July, 1919?

Mr. REED. Yes; I have.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator must recall that our food supply has been largely increased; and while it is true that more has gone to Europe, is it not also true that our supply is greater, and that we have a greater supply of foodstuffs to-day than we had a year ago, when prices were a good deal lower?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think so at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any figures on that subject?

Mr. REED. I am coming to that and will try to answer it. I do not want to say anything now that is in the slightest degree ironical, but I think from his speech of yesterday the Senator has cold storage on the brain. He opens up the ice box and looks in there for all the troubles of the world. To him it is the Pandora's box from which come forth all the evils there are.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we could get it on the statute books I think it would be better than having it on the brain.

Mr. REED. My dear sir, it is on the statute books now——

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is not.

Mr. REED (continuing). That any man who hoards for the purpose of controlling prices can be sent to the penitentiary for a long term of years.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no penalty attached.

Mr. REED. There is a penalty.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the Attorney General says not.

Mr. REED. I do not care what any Attorney General says on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee misunderstands the view of the Attorney General. Section 6 of the food-control act provides a fine of $5,000 or two years in the penitentiary, one or both, for hoarding, and the Attorney General so construed it yesterday before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it has been held by a number of courts that there is no penalty, and the Attorney General of the United States has appeared before Congress asking for legislation affording a penalty. He has stated in open interviews that if the Congress will provide a penalty he will secure results in 60 days, and he ought to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I challenge the Senator from Tennessee to produce the decision of a court holding anything of the kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The statute is as plain as words can be. Section 6 provides a penalty for hoarding of two years in the penitentiary and a fine of $5,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will furnish the decision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was not that part of section 4 applicable to hoarding the Attorney General desired to reach by additional penalties.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to be diverted from my line of argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting.

Mr. REED. No; that is all right. I am going into this cold-storage business and into the Attorney General's opinion. I say that any man who can not take that statute as it is to-day and punish under it or under the general statutes of the United States any act of monopoly, any act of hoarding to control prices, or any act of conspiracy to control prices, needs to go into a law office and read law, and he ought to begin at the beginning. I am going to discuss that matter, and I have the sections marked here. There is enough law on the statute books now to send every man, woman, and child living to the penitentiary; and the remedy we get is not enforcement but a clamor for more laws.

I have nothing to say against Mr. Palmer; but the fact that a man happens to be appointed Attorney General of the United States, confirmed or unconfirmed, does not increase by one whit the sum total of his legal knowledge. There are other lawyers in the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. On this subject I desire to quote from a message of the President of the United States on August 8, 1919.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator putting that in as a legal authority?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am; of the highest value.

Mr. REED. Quote it.

Mr. McKELLAR (reading)—

> There are many other ways. Existing law is inadequate. There are many perfectly legitimate methods by which the Government can exercise restraint and guidance.
> Let me urge, in the first place, that the present food-control act should be extended both as to the period of time during which it shall remain in operation and as to the commodities to which it shall apply. Its provisions against hoarding should be made to apply not only to food but also to feedstuffs, to fuel, to clothing, and to many other commodities which are indisputably necessaries of life. As it stands now it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace. But I should judge that it was clearly within the constitutional power of the Congress to make similar permanent provisions and regulations with regard to all goods destined for interstate commerce and to exclude them from interstate shipment if the requirements of the law are not complied with. Some such regulation is imperatively necessary. The abuses that have grown up in the manipulation of prices by the withholding of foodstuffs and other necessaries of life can not otherwise be effectively prevented. There can be no doubt of either the necessity or the legitimacy of such measures. May I not call attention to the fact, also, that, although the present act prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that a penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if the President took that position, he could not have read the entire act. Section 4 does not provide the penalty, but specific penalties are provided further on in the act with reference to several of the offenses pointed out in section 4. Now, the immediate subject we had under discussion was the subject of hoarding. Let me read from the statute, not section 4, but section 6, defining and broadening the definition of hoarding.

Section 6 reads:

> That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

If the act does not provide a punishment for hoarding, what does that mean?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to discuss that a little later, but I will here put in the RECORD an epitome of the penalties in the present food-control act:

The President in his message of August 8, 1919, states:

> May I not call attention to the fact, also, that, although the present act—food-control act—prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that the penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

The penalties in the food-control act are:

Section 3 of the act provides a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine or five years' imprisonment, or both, for anyone connected with the Government selling to the Government.

Section 5 provides for the license of manufacturers and storage houses, and provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both, for anyone who refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the license regulation.

Section 6 provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both, for any person who willfully hoards any necessities, and defines the term "hoarding."

Section 7 provides procedure by the district attorneys to prosecute and institute libel proceedings against any such hoarders.

Section 8 provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for any person who destroys necessaries to enhance the price or restrict the supply thereof.

Section 9 provides a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for any person who conspires, combines, or agrees to limit facilities of transportation, production, manufacturing, supplying, or dealing in any necessities; or restricts the supply of any necessities; or prevents, or limits, or lessens the manufacture or production of necessities.

Section 13 provide a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine, or imprisonment for four years, or both, for those violating any of the President's regulations about boards of trade, exchange, etc.

Section 15 provides a maximum punishment of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for anyone violating any of the provisions in regard to the use of grain in the production of liquors and beverages.

Section 17 provides a maximum punishment of a $1,000 fine, or one year's imprisonment, or both, for any person who interferes with any United States officer in the execution of any duty imposed by this act.

Section 25 provides a maximum punishment of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for anyone receiving higher prices than have been fixed by the President.

Section 26 is a blanket penalty provision for the whole act, which is as follows:

> That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

I do not want to say a harsh thing about the Attorney General, and I certainly do not want to say anything harsh about the President; but, Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is a great lawyer, who won his spurs not by appointment but in the great forum of the law, did not have any trouble in putting his finger on the language of a statute by which you could send a hoarder to the penitentiary.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator believe that a simple inhibition—and I wish to ask both these great lawyers that question——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We both accept the compliment. [Laughter.] Go on.

Mr. STANLEY. I say that in perfectly good faith. Does the Senator believe that a simple inhibition against hoarding would meet the alleged evils of which the President and the public generally complain, and the alleged abuses of the cold-storage situation? What I mean is this: Is not a provision against hoarding a good deal like a provision against monopolizing, too general ever to secure a conviction under?

Mr. REED. But there are plenty of specifications, if the Senator will read the law; and the law came over to us with the words of sanctity blown into it. When it came, it came to us from the legal department at the other end of the Capitol—the present law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not only that, but following this language the Senator will find three definitions of hoarding which I maintain absolutely cover the cold-storage problem and entirely furnish the opportunity to prevent improper conduct in the line of cold storage. That was the immediate subject that was under discussion when we were told that the bill contained no punishment for hoarding. Section 6 of the bill—not section 4; section 4 makes hoarding illegal—section 6 defines more fully what hoarding shall consist of and puts the penalty upon it. Section 4 does not prescribe any penalties. It declares certain things to be illegal. Six classes of conduct are made illegal. Three of those are subsequently punished as crimes. The other three are left to be reached by the President under section 5, which provides for the licensing system, with the privilege to the President to revoke the license if his rules as to profits are disregarded.

That is the general scope of the bill. I was upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when the bill was framed, and I think it went about as far as we could constitutionally go. I am not meaning to criticize the suggestions of the Attorney General. I may support some of them. I was only seeking to urge that the bill which we passed, and which has been in force for more than two years, which we thought was sufficient during war times to control the problem of food prices, has teeth in it, and that there is much in it that could be used.

Mr. STANLEY. I was addressing my question to the statement of the Senator that the law prohibited hoarding, and I did not think that without specifications a mere blanket inhibition against hoarding would be of any value.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We did not think so, either; and we put in it three definitions which we thought and which I feel sure certainly cover the case of hoarding in cold storage.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator think the law is broad enough now to cover the situation that exists?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not say that.

Mr. STANLEY. That is the crux of the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was only taking issue with the Senator from Tennessee on the statement that the cold-storage people could not be reached under this law. I feel sure that they can be reached.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that the criticism about there not being ample penalties applies to profiteering; not to the hoarding features of the bill, but to profiteering. That is the section under which there appear to be no penalties.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are penalties as to profiteering, but the law treats them as a class. It is in case of a conspiracy, where two or more combine to profiteer, that the punishment takes place. If a single man profiteers or charges an unreasonable price there is no punishment. The theory of those who drew the act was that it was impossible for one man in a community to set up by himself and establish excessive and unreasonable prices of a serious character unless others combine with him; that the others selling at reasonable prices would break him down and destroy his business. But even that line of misconduct was covered in section 5, which allows the President to regulate with licenses all lines of trade in foodstuffs beyond the retail merchant who sold less than $100,000 worth of supplies a year; and the President could prescribe rules fixing percentages of profits and revoke licenses if those rules were disregarded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to be diverted from my argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. No; that is all right. It is interesting. I want to get through, however. I am obliged to the Senator from Georgia and I am obliged to the Senator from Tennessee, too, for his interruptions. While I am on this subject, I should just like to have somebody tell me where there is escape from this language of section 26:

> That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article—

And it describes human food and fuel, and so forth—

> for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator after his inhibition, but this is a very practical matter that I believe the question will turn upon. It strikes me that the trouble with your act there is that it punishes the destruction of foods for the purpose of fixing prices, and you have to prove the purpose.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. STANLEY. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand that there is great complaint, and I have heard it myself, in several cities of the destruction of foodstuffs that are still edible, like fruits, by dumping them into the rivers. I was in Cincinnati the other day, and the charge was made that thousands of pounds of fruits were dumped into the Ohio River at night in order to maintain the prices at these several places. There are allegations that eggs are dumped, and things of that kind, that have been kept in cold storage for an excessive period. Now, it strikes me that it will be necessary further to limit the conduct of cold-storage plants in order to reach those abuses, because the Senator is more familiar than I am with the difficulty of proving intent in any statute of that character.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question that the Senator raises is covered in section 8:

> That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the sale thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Now, the purpose. There is no statutory law that could be passed that would send any man to the penitentiary or punish any man for an innocent holding of a thing that he owns. Pass such a statute as that and I will guarantee to drive a coach and four through it the first time I get into a court of record. You can not say to the citizen who holds his own property for a perfectly innocent purpose that he can not so hold it. You destroy property rights, you take it without due process of law, and so forth—all the inhibitions of the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. We are discussing a question which has not anything at all to do with the question I am discussing; but if the Senator from Tennessee wants to elucidate this thing further, I will yield for that purpose, and then I am going on.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am just going to ask one question. The food-control act provides, among other things, as follows:

> To establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

The war is in fact over.

Mr. REED. That is a different question.

Mr. McKELLAR. It goes right to the meat of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. REED. It does not go to the meat of your interruption. I started to discuss the condition of cold-storage plants to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me answer that in a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just let me finish my statement. It provides that it shall be enforced during the war, and raises a serious question, in the first place, as to whether a state of war now exists. Technically, possibly it does exist, but in fact we know it does not. In addition to that, no appropriations have been made by Congress to carry out the provisions of the act. The food-control organization has been dispensed with, substantially speaking, and for that reason it is impossible to get relief under that act.

Mr. REED. The matter the Senator is now discussing is miles away from the question I have under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Section 24 of the act expressly provides that it shall terminate after the proclamation of the President declaring peace. It in its own language fixes the time when the war will end, and that time is the proclamation of peace by the President. So there can be no doubt about the act being in force now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield to me for just a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], while section 26 of the act which the Senator from Missouri read a moment ago is undoubtedly subject to the limitation to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] referred, as contained in section 24 of the act, so that it ceases to be in effect when the President has proclaimed the end of the war, whether it is not based merely upon the war powers of the Government? While section 26 of the act is subject to that limitation, it need not be subject to it. It is based upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and Congress in enacting it could remove this limitation. It is in effect now. There is no moral reason or any consideration of business which ought to cause the administration to hesitate for a moment to give it effect as long as the law will allow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, after having circumnavigated the seas and oceans of the world, coming back to the theme I was discussing—and I am trying to stick to the text, the question of the great, principal cause of shortage—I was discussing the fact that we are now sending vast quantities of goods abroad, thus depleting our own supplies and at the same time, so far as prices are not controlled in the interests of Europe by the organizations that have been set up, we are putting in competition with ourselves the markets of Europe, and then we are doing more than that. We are lending them, as I have shown, the money with which to overbid us.

But speaking now of the amount that has been handled, let me say that I wired Mr. Julius Barnes, of the United States Grain Corporation, on yesterday as follows:

Please wire me immediately the amount and kind of foodstuffs forwarded to each of the various European countries through your organization since the armistice was signed. Also whether the same was paid for in whole or in part by funds furnished by this Government or other American sources and what part, if any, was donated. Are shipments still being continued, and, if so, in what countries? There seems to be confusion as to the facts, and I want to lay the exact facts before the Senate. Immediate information is desired.

(Signed) JAMES A. REED.

This is the reply that came this morning. I am going to read it:

Referring to your telegram of 13th. Since November 11 there has been shipped to various European countries various foods handled through the Grain Corporation, as follows:

Wheat to Allies, 2,793,000 tons; Holland, 37,000; Spain, 4,000; Switzerland, 132,000; Belgium, 598,000.

Rye, Allies, 36,000; Holland, 10,000; Norway, 50,000; Switzerland, 23,000; Belgium, 45,000.

Barley, Allies, 56,000; Holland, 140,000; Belgium, 29,000; Sweden, 3,000.

Corn, Allies, 6,000; Holland, 1,000; Switzerland, 3,000; Belgium, 41,000.

Wheat flour, Allies, 1,013,000; Holland, 101,000; Norway, 3,000; Switzerland, 7,000; Portugal, 5,000; Belgium, 26,000.

Cereal four, Allies, 23,000; Holland, 8,000; Switzerland, 3,000; Belgium, 33,000.

Beans and peas, Allies, 66,000; Belgium, 28,000.

Rice, Belgium, 60,000.

All the preceding shipments were paid for to the Grain Corporation in dollars, but, undoubtedly, the Allies and Belgium secured their money from credits with our Treasury.

So that we loaned them all that money to buy it, and we are taxing our people, of course, and we also are taxing them for interest. I am not complaining. I am not criticizing this. I am just calling attention to the bald facts. I will continue to read:

Now, besides those direct shipments and direct purchases there was shipped to the American Relief Administration direction abroad and distributed by the director general of relief into various areas of Europe including that directed into Germany under the Supreme War Council the following quantities: Wheat, 3,000 tons; rye, 527,000; barley, 8,000; corn, 3,000; wheat flour, 681,000; cereal flours, 180,000; beans and peas, 67,000; rice, 25,000; condensed and evaporated milk, 35,000; lard, 17,000; lard substitutes, 40,000; cottonseed oil, 1,000; cocoa powder, 2,000; sugar, 2,000; pork products, 46,000. A total tonnage in all directions of about 7,000,000 tons, and after the armistice all of these foodstuffs except wheat and wheat flour on relaxation of control could be bought outside of the grain corporation so that there may be additional shipments to some of these countries in other foods. Of the approximate 1,600,000 tons shipped by the grain corporation for distribution by the director general of relief there was received in payment approximately the following:

From Germany $100,000,000 in actual German gold delivered the Federal Reserve Bank by the Germans; cash received from purchasers, $33,000,000; advanced by United States Treasury to pay for foodstuffs to Roumania, $25,000,000; advanced by United States Treasury to pay for foodstuffs to Czechoslovakia, $50,000,000; advanced by United States Treasury to pay for foodstuffs to Serbia, $14,000,000; received and to be received from congressional appropriation of relief outside of Germany and Austria, $100,000,000; received from President for special relief, $5,000,000; total approximately $327,000,000, which will provide for ocean freights paid largely to the United States Shipping Board for the transportation of these relief foodstuffs. No further shipments are contemplated to be made for direction by the director general of relief except possibly moderate quantities of milk, cocoa, sugar, and similar child-feeding supplies and no purchases have been made of packing-house products, oils, or lard substitutes, or rice after the date of removal of stabilization in those commodities, so that the advances in price which followed the removal of stabilization was in no manner influenced by continued governmental purchases.

JULIUS H. BARNES,
Wheat Director.

Of course that is his opinion, but I put it in.

Taking a survey of the field, is there anything astonishing about prices having gone up on these things?

I have no hesitancy in saying that if this European market in its present condition could be kept up indefinitely and they furnish the money instead of we, in a little while the American farmer and the American merchant and everybody else would get rich. Of course it will not be kept up, and it ought not to be.

Mr. President, I have discussed breadstuffs. Let me call attention to meat and dairy products; and here again you find the same condition of affairs. Men may shut their eyes and deny great causes, but it is not the part of wisdom, it seems to me, to follow that course. I hate a monopoly, I believe, as badly as any man living. I hate a monopoly so much that I am sometimes ashamed of myself when I take an inventory of my feelings. From the days when old Pharaoh got a monopoly on the wheat in Egypt and starved the people until they sold their bodies to him in bondage for the wheat with which to feed their stomachs, every monopolist this world has ever produced has been worse than a thief who robs on the highway. That is my opinion of a monopoly, very briefly expressed.

But we must not, if we are to get at the source of the disease, attribute it to the misconduct of a neighbor in an adjoining lot when the difficulty may be in our own kitchen. That is a very poor illustration of my thought, which is simply this, that we must get at the truth of the matter. When I have laid these figures before the Senate I am not going to pretend to say that I am wise enough to present a cure-all, but if I have in some days of diligent labor brought some facts together for the benefit of other Members, so that they may think about them, I shall be content.

Meats and dairy products—what about them? The exports of meats and dairy products show a similar increase. They consistently mounted from $153,883,526 worth in 1913 to $1,167,850,576 in 1919, almost ten times the value. Assuming that they doubled in price, which I think is unfair, we shipped abroad five times the amount we sent in normal years; and that does not count the immense shipments we made to our overseas forces. Plainly, if a considerable portion of this meat had not gone abroad meat prices would have broken in this country. Now, when we are shipping abroad out of the country over one thousand million dollars worth more than we do in normal years it must have an effect in this country. Observe the vastness of these shipments. When we are talking about putting upon the market in order to stabilize prices the supplies that the Army has on hand, compare their supply of meat to the vast amount that went abroad. I am not complaining of this putting of the meat upon the market. Whatever we can do of that kind is all right, but it will soon be gone. It can not feed the American people very long.

Coming now to the figures here, I want to say what I am now putting in I am putting in as an ex parte statement of the packing-house companies. I do not vouch for their accuracy, and there may be some facts that are withheld that I do not know of, but I put the statements in, and I can not conceive of these gentlemen daring to baldly misrepresent facts upon which they have been checked up and upon which they can be checked again in the future by the public authorities.

I sent a telegram to each of the five great packers which I wish to put into the RECORD, for I want this material to set on its own bottom; I want the statements to stand for themselves. I do not say that to discredit them. My own personal opinion is that these statements will be found to be substantially accurate. Some of them are taken from public records. This is the telegram which I sent each of the five great packers:

It was in substance charged yesterday before the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives, first, that the five great packing companies practically have a monopoly on cold storage; second, that they have disregarded the law of supply and demand; third, that they have control over the public and can hold or sell as they please, and that millions of pounds of poultry and meat have been allowed to spoil, because the large interests refuse to sell at existing prices. What have you to say with reference to the truth of these charges? In replying, please state specifically the amount of meats, poultry, fish, and provisions held in cold storage at the present time and the length of time it would supply the public demand if placed on the market.

I assume that you have inventories taken each year at given dates showing the amounts on hand both before and during the war on the dates of inventory.

Please give me these figures for comparative purposes. I would like to have a reply during the day, if possible, as I will probably want to use the figures in the Senate to-morrow. Kindly acknowledge receipt at once and advise whether I can have the figures promptly. This telegram goes to each of the five great packing concerns.

JAMES A. REED.

Mr. President, I received a telegram from Swift & Co., and afterwards their representative, a former professor of Yale College, Prof. L. D. H. Weld, called on me and left with me a statement along with a letter of transmittal. The letter is addressed to me and reads:

I transmit herewith a statement with regard to live-stock and meat prices, and also with regard to cold-storage operations of Swift & Co.

This is in response to your telegram of August 13, addressed to Mr. Louis F. Swift, who has asked me to prepare this information and place it in your hands.

Respectfully, yours,

L. D. H. WELD,
Manager Commercial Research Department Swift & Co.,
Chicago, Ill.

This is his memorandum:

INCREASE IN LIVE-STOCK AND MEAT PRICES.

(In round figures.)

Native beef cattle, 1915, $8.50; 1918, $14.75; increase, 73 per cent.

That is for the native cattle; for the live cattle—

Hogs in 1915, $7.25 a hundred; 1918, $17.50 a hundred; increase, 147 per cent.

Prices of dressed beef and pork products increased only in the same proportion as live-animal prices from 1915 to 1918.

Since January 1, 1919, hogs have gone higher than 23 cents, while cattle have fallen. This is due to the continued and heavy foreign demand for pork and fats, while foreign demand for beef has disappeared.

Prices of all meats have not risen more than prices of breadstuffs in general. Pork has risen more than the average and beef less. Beef is now positively cheap, as compared with other foods.

The Department of Agriculture, in statement of July 4, 1919, showed that while prices of medium and good steers at Chicago had fallen from $1.50 to $3.90 per 100 from March 1 to July 1, 1919, the wholesale price of medium and good dressed-beef carcasses had fallen from $3 to $7 per 100.

REASONS FOR HIGH PRICES OF MEATS AND LIVE STOCK.

Although cattle and hog production has increased during the past four years, prices have gone up, for the following reasons:

1. Currency inflation, which has raised prices of all products.
2. Enormous demand at home, due to high wages of working people.
3. Unprecedented demands from abroad:

	Pounds.
Exports of beef:
1914	148,500,000
1918	590,900,000
Exports of pork:
1914	921,900,000
1918	1,690,000,000

4. High costs of producing animals on farms, and of slaughtering and marketing, and higher freight rates.

That is another cause he assigns.

It takes about 10 bushels of corn to make 100 pounds of live hog. Corn has risen from 75 cents a bushel to $1.75 in three years. This means that whereas 10 bushels of corn in 1915 were worth $7.50, at about which price hogs were selling, in 1918 10 bushels of corn were worth $17.50, which represented hog values during 1918. Since January 1, 1919, corn has gone up to $2 a bushel and hogs over $20.

It may be that that has not anything to do with prices, that it is all cold storage, but I think it does have something to do with them.

Recent increase in hog prices is largely accounted for by increase in export of pork.

Now, get these figures:

Bacon, 87,294,477 in June, 1918; June, 1919, 172,441,100.
Hams and shoulders, June, 1918, 47,465,506; June, 1919, 96,854,552.
Lard, June, 1918, 29,248,133; June, 1919, 114,328,804.
The drop in beef prices is due largely to decrease in exports.

Fresh beef exported in June, 1918, was 58,485,520 pounds; exported in June, 1919, only 15,212,094 pounds.

Last week Swift & Co. showed to the District of Columbia subcommittee of the Senate that whereas it now costs about 2½ cents per pound of beef to slaughter, pay freight, and distribute through selling houses into the hands of retailers, this expense was only 1½ cents in 1916. This is practically due to higher wages. It means that the wholesale price of dressed beef is 1 cent per pound higher as compared with live cattle than if operating costs had not increased.

Swift & Co. at this hearing, August 7, 1919, also gave the following detailed figures to the committee, showing the average cost of cattle and selling price of beef sold in Washington for the five weeks ending August 2, 1919:

Paid for live cattle, per hundred pounds, $12.73.
Amount of beef from 100 pounds live animal, 55.14 pounds.
Raw material cost, per hundred pounds, $23.09.
Expense killing, freight, selling, $2.50.
Total cost and expense, $25.59.
Received for hides and by-products, $6.69.
Net cost of beef, $18.90.
Price actually received in Washington, $19.01.
Net profit, 11 cents, or one-ninth of a cent per pound.

If these figures are false, they ought to be easily checked up here by the authorities, for the packers are bringing these products to the local markets. Of course, this is the average price for the whole carcass; it is not the porterhouse steak, but it is the average price.

The Food Administration in its recent report showed that the profit of the five large packers for 1918 was less than 2 cents on each dollar of sales in their meat business and only 5.6 per cent of total capital employed, including borrowed money. Swift & Co.'s profit in 1918 was about 11 per cent on owned investment.

Now, this man comments:

It looks from these figures as though the packers can not very well be blamed for high prices. It is pertinent to suggest that probably, because of their great efficiency, low operating costs, and low profits, they have been able to sell meat at a lower price, compared with the price of live stock, than would otherwise have been possible.

Cold storage—

Now I come to the question that so much interests my very good friend from Tennessee—

The five large packers—

Says this gentleman—

have no monopoly of cold storage. Department of Agriculture figures of cold-storage space are as follows: Freezer space under 29° total 112,000,000 cubic feet. All packing houses—

That is the five great packers, and the little ones, too—

39,000,000 cubic feet; per cent of total, 35. Total cold-storage space, all temperatures—

That is, it includes cold storage where freezing temperatures are maintained and every other kind of cold storage—

463,000,000 cubic feet. All packing houses, 239,000,000 cubic feet; per cent of total, 52.

That is to say of freezer space, all the packing houses have 25 per cent, and of all cold-storage space 52 per cent.

The Federal Trade Commission reports (pt. 3, p. 129, Report on Packers) that five large packers have only 44.8 per cent of total cold-storage space.

The per cent of five large packers is probably not more than 25 per cent of all freezer space.

The freezer capacity is the important item, because most storage products are frozen solid.

Swift & Co. has about 7,000,000 cubic feet of freezer space, or about 5 per cent of total. This includes all space of Swift interests.

Swift & Co. puts in storage at the season of surplus production only what it needs to supply its trade during season of scarcity. This is not hoarding. It results in lower prices during greater part of the year than would otherwise exist. It performs a necessary economic service. It has no power to control or manipulate prices. Losses are frequently suffered on storage business. Profits in long run are no more than reasonable—only enough to induce us to assume the great risk involved.

Less than 10 per cent of the total annual production of butter and meat finds its way into cold storage at any one time. About 15 per cent of total production of eggs is stored.

Thousands of dealers compete in the purchase and sale of goods put into storage. United States Food Administration stated in bulletin issued May 18, 1918, that there were more than 400 storage houses, some with as many as 500 different dealers renting space for egg storage. The total number of holders reaches into tens of thousands. The Food Administration also said, "No owner has sufficient holdings to dominate the market."

Figures were presented to the House Committee on Agriculture by Senator MCKELLAR to show that although storage stocks had increased prices had risen. This does not mean manipulation—

Says this gentleman. The Senator from Tennessee smiles——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I would hardly expect him to admit that it does mean manipulation.

Mr. REED. The Senator can not smile a fact away. He might entertain me with his smile—he always does—but it is easy to see whether it is really a laughing matter. That is the fact as stated; I do not know that the statement is true, but it accords in part with some things the Senator said the other day, and wherever it accords with anything the Senator said the other day I know that it is "holy writ."

For example, he said:

Poultry stocks were only 18,000,000 pounds June 1 last year and 54,000,000 this year, and yet prices had risen 4 cents.

The 54,000,000 pounds is only about 3 per cent of annual production of poultry, or only a 10 days' supply. This small amount is a negligible factor in determination of prices. Stocks were abnormally low in 1918; poultry stocks of 1919 are no more than normal and even smaller than in 1917. High prices are due to other causes, largely export demand.

These packing houses do not raise chickens; they buy them.

Monthly Crop Reporter for June, 1919, page 60, shows the farmers were getting for chickens on June 1, 1918, 20 cents per pound, and on June 1, 1919, 25.7 cents per pound. This shows that increased price of this year went to farmers and shows that it was not due to manipulation by cold-storage people. Prices to farmers on other products have also increased.

I continue reading without comment:

Swift & Co. handles only about 6 per cent of the total butter, eggs, and poultry business of the United States, and holds only about same proportion of these products put in storage.

Five large packers together store not more than 15 or 20 per cent of these products.

We are governed entirely by law of supply and demand.

It is absurd to charge that cold-storage goods are allowed to spoil. Any concern foolish enough to let valuable goods spoil would suffer a heavy loss. Perishable products will keep well over a year in cold storage without becoming unwholesome. Any law limiting storage to few months is unnecessary and would be harmful. Storage goods come out of storage so that stocks are cleaned up by time next season's surplus production occurs.

Fresh meat can not be stored without freezing it solid. Domestic trade dislikes frozen meats, though large quantities have been frozen during past two or three years for shipment overseas.

Now, Mr. President, I have here a table having to do with poultry which shows that Swift & Co.'s storage holdings June 1, 1917, of poultry in pounds were 12,227,247; in 1918, 2,073,529; and in 1919, 7,095,257, so that their amount in storage now is over 5,000,000 pounds less than it was in 1917, although it is about that same amount more than it was in 1918; and yet, I take it, the prices will show the same differences.

Butter: 1917, 560,000 pounds; 1918, 751,387 pounds; 1919, 717,440 pounds—less than they had in 1918, although a little more than in 1917.

Eggs: 1917, 402,800 cases; 1918, 431,518 cases; 1919, 407,960 cases.

Why did the Senator pick out poultry, and pick out the single year of 1918? Of course, it is a mistake. A man who takes a single item and undertakes to reason from that is liable to make a mistake.

Let us see about the supply—the number of days' supply—for these people's regular trade. This man says they have poultry enough for 30 days, butter for 4 days, and eggs for 48 days. Now, the eggs are at the apex at this period of the year. The eggs are now practically all stored that are to carry them through the year. The chickens will soon quit laying in abundance.

I am not going to read, for it takes too much time, a table that is prepared showing the percentage of totals stored by Swift. I will insert that without reading, with the permission of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Per cent of total stored by Swift July 1, 1919.

	Total United States.	Swift.	Per cent of total.
Total	1,734,633,400	311,371,800	17.9
Frozen beef	162,386,600	13,601,800	8.4
Cured beef	29,217,600	3,937,200	13.5
Frozen pork	153,894,000	23,482,600	15.3
D. S. pork	380,462,800	118,470,000	31.1
S. P. pork	421,503,000	104,233,000	24.7
Lard	91,944,500	19,448,000	21.1
Mutton	7,273,200	1,088,300	15.0
Total, meat alone	1,246,686,700	284,261,900	22.7
Poultry	48,895,700	4,372,600	8.9
Eggs	7,508,500	471,300	6.3
Butter	87,851,400	2,141,200	2.5
Cheese	48,727,200	1,851,100	3.8
Fish	77,217,400	4,607,000	6.0

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator mind repeating the periods to supply which they have these foods stored that the Senator has just read? Eggs for what—four weeks? What did the Senator say?

Mr. REED. Swift & Co. say they have enough poultry to supply their trade for 30 days, butter 4 days, and eggs 48 days; this being at about the close of the season, when the eggs are accumulating.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator this question: If that be a fact, how would any law limiting their period of storage to seven months hurt them?

Mr. REED. I am not discussing that law. That is a different question. I am discussing purely an economic question here to-day. I am not saying that there may not be some legislation that may do some good; but I am trying, as far as I am able to do it, to lay some facts before the Senate, and by as persuasive method as I can employ to impress the doctrine that taking an enormous number of men out of production has a great deal to do with creating shortages in the world, and that those shortages have a great deal to do with prices.

Mr. President, there is a telegram here from Wilson & Co. which is in keeping with the statement I have read, although it does not go so much into detail. There is a telegram here from Armour & Co. and some tables that they have sent. I do not intend to take the time of the Senate to read these long telegrams; so that those who are interested may read them, I will ask that they be printed in the RECORD for that purpose.

AUGUST 6, 1919.

The NEW YORK WORLD,
Office of the Editor, Pulitzer Building, New York City.

DEAR SIRS: We appreciate your courtesy in including our company in the list of those to whom your circular letter is being sent in the effort to determine the proper answers to some five questions, which we repeat below. These are certainly matters of the gravest public concern and warrant the most careful investigation, study, and statesmanship. Facts must be ascertained and correct principles acted upon. Legislative or other action taken with a view to expediency, politics, or prejudice can not fail but do great harm.

So far as the packing industry is concerned, it recently went on record through the Institute of American Meat Packers, in an official telegram to the President, offering the fullest cooperation with respect to the determination of the answer as to "What is the cause of the high cost of meats?" It furthermore felt sufficiently sure that the packing industry is not in any respect the cause that it volunteered to have its members turn over their books for the verification of costs, prices, and profits.

In answer to your specific questions, which we quote hereinafter, we are excluding such items as monetary inflation and other economic matters, which, while highly important, nevertheless are not properly subjects for theoretical discussion by a practical business corporation at this time. And while we are mentioning these factors we do not mean to intimate that they are the only ones at work. They appear simply to be the most fundamental and controlling factors.

You ask us for:

1. "The cause or causes of the high cost of living," to which we answer that, to the best of our judgment, the most important factors are:

(a) A relative shortage of the various necessaries of life, as compared with the unparalleled demand.

(b) Wage scales on such high levels as to not only largely make for greatly increased costs of commodities but also, and perhaps what is more important, to have so multiplied the spending ability of the American people as to have itself greatly intensified increased demand.

In other words, millions of people are receiving more money per week or per month than they ever did before, and they are spending it with equal liberality, thus affecting the prices of all commodities and for all classes of people.

(c) The Government itself, because of the necessity of raising a fabulous income to meet its needs, through the tax laws now in effect, is a partner to a very large extent in any surplus earnings which any corporation or person may receive. While this is proper, it none the less creates a tendency to maintain high price levels as well as profits where it is possible that they be procured.

2. You ask: "To what extent have increased labor wages contributed to prevailing prices, against which there is universal complaint?"

We have already mentioned that factor and indicated the double effect thereof. The cost of the live animal, which represents an expenditure of some 85 per cent of our gross receipts from all animal products, is the largest item in the cost of preparation of meat and other products. Next to this, the greatest expense is for wages and labor. These account for some 10 cents additional out of each dollar taken in. These expenses are now from two to three fold the prewar levels. At all times they are probably four times the aggregate of the entire net profit of the employers of our industry.

3. "To what extent is unwarranted profiteering by producer, middleman, and retailer responsible?"

Without a complete study of the costs of doing business of the various other factors we, of course, like yourself and the public generally are unable to answer this question, but we feel sufficiently satisfied with the fair-mindedness of business men generally as to believe that the others, just as is the case with the packers, are probably, with few exceptions, doing their business on a basis of relatively reasonable profits. The prevailing prices are undoubtedly largely due to the high costs.

4. "What steps should be taken to bring the current prices for food, clothing, fuel, and other staple necessaries of life down to reasonable levels?"

Speaking from the standpoint of the packing industry, we should say that arbitrary, legislative, and governmental efforts to influence wage scales, commodities, prices, etc., will cause more harm than good. The most permanent and sane relief will be due to the working out with as little artificial restraint as is possible to put upon it increased production of supplies—agricultural, manufactured, and commercial—so that they may more nearly correspond with the demand. Of course, increased production per hourly cost of labor would be of material assistance, as would certain modifications in the revenue acts and other restrictive legislation.

5. "Why have previous efforts to remove the cause or causes for the constantly mounting cost of living failed?"

We are not fully advised as to what other efforts there may have been or what you have in mind in asking this question. Our idea is that governmental and other spasmodic and temporary efforts are bound to defeat themselves, and that the real remedy is as we have suggested in the answer to question 4.

Yours, very truly,

THE CUDAHY PACKING CO.,
_____,
Vice President.

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., August 14, 1919.

Hon. J. A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Answering your telegram of yesterday, the only cold-storage plants in which Wilson & Co. are in any way interested are those on our premises connected with their packing plants, used in the usual course of their business, and that they have no ownership in other public cold-storage plants anywhere in the United States.

The suggestion that they have disregarded the law of supply and demand is absurd. Our business is absolutely controlled by that law. Statement that they control the public and can hold and sell as they please is also absurd. Our facilities are sufficient only for continuing business, and should we hold our products contrary to the law of supply and demand our facilities would soon be blocked, and we would necessarily have to stop killing and other operations. A cessation of 48 hours shipping would automatically stop slaughtering operations. This we have never done, and could not do and maintain our business. The statement that millions of pounds of poultry and meats have been allowed to spoil because large interests refused to sell at existing prices is also ridiculous. No large quantities of meats or poultry owned by Wilson & Co. have spoiled from any cause. On August 8, 1919, Wilson & Co. had on hand at all points in this country 34,578,000 pounds of pork products. August 9, 1918, 34,705,000 pounds, a less amount this year than last, notwithstanding we have since the first of the year killed approximately 18 per cent more hogs than we did for the same period last year. This clearly shows that our movements up to date this year has been more active than last year, notwithstanding that this and other Governments were large buyers of these products last year and have bought practically nothing this year.

These goods do not represent finished products, but is our entire stock on hand, the larger portion of which is in the process of manufacture, curing, etc., requiring many weeks. In the normal course of business all of these goods would go into consumption within eight weeks.

Our stock of beef products in cold storage to-day amounts to 4,500,000 pounds; one year ago, 11,000,000 pounds. This does not take into consideration fresh beef being daily shipped consuming centers. All our fresh beef leaves the packing points within from three to six days from the time of slaughter, and is a continuous process. The 4,500,000 pounds is practically made up of beef in preparation for shipment abroad. The sales on our books now exceed this entire quantity. The balance is miscellaneous cuts handled in the usual course of business. We carry no fish in storage other than canned fish, such as salmon and herring, but this is not a cold-storage proposition.

I believe this covers your inquiry, and if you desire additional information we will be only too glad to furnish anything that you might require.

THOMAS E. WILSON.

W. C. KIRK,
Washington Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Please deliver the following message to Senator JAMES A. REED:

Referring to your telegram of even date, we believe figures can be obtained from the Bureau of Markets showing total amount of cold storage in country, and in what ownership, and that they will show very small proportion belong to packers. We have had no poultry or meats spoiled. In considering Armour & Co. stocks of product it must be understood that they include product in cure which has not yet advanced to state of being in market condition; that they represent an accumulation of product at a time when live-stock receipts are at very heaviest and are greater than the immediate demand; that it is necessary to accumulate this product in times of plenty for a time of shortage. We are in the latter period on hog product at this moment. Our total stocks on June 28, the last inventory period, of meats and provisions amounted to 262,600,000 pounds, against 263,800,000 pounds for the previous year. This total stock represents the product in packing houses located at the following points: Chicago, Omaha, St. Joseph, Sioux City, St. Louis, Kansas City, Fort Worth, Spokane, Tifton, Denver, Jacksonville, New York City, and Jersey City. Included in stock is approximately 4,000,000 pounds of bacon under contract to United States Government. In considering these figures please understand total hog receipts past season have been greatly increased over previous year, and our killing represents an increase of 24.6 per cent. This total stock of meat products would represent about six weeks' shipments for our business, and would not supply the total requirements of the United States more than two days. Our average weekly shipments were approximately 50,000,000 pounds, and we are just approaching the heavy distributing season for cured food products. There is nothing unusual about this stock. As to butter, cheese, eggs, and poultry, last year, on account of war conditions, there was but very small storage stocks, and the 1918 figures are hardly representative of an average storage season's accumulation. We have just finished the accumulative period on butter and cheese and are going into the distributive season. Our total stocks of all products in this department would represent about six weeks' sales. Following are the stocks as of August 1:

Cheese	12,198,214	6,753,070	6,917,595
Poultry	3,563,946	701,190	3,724,000
Butter	9,113,030	4,763,561	5,377,652
Eggs	3,186,850	2,085,350	1,530,000

While our stocks in these products show an increase, the following table will show the difference between the increase in stocks and the increase in sales in 1919 over 1914:

	Per cent.
Increase in stock of cheese	55
Increase in sales of cheese	103
Decrease in stock of poultry	4
Increase in sales of poultry	32
Increase in stock of butter	54.8
Increase in sales of butter	123
Increase in stock of eggs	108
Increase in sales of eggs	113

The above represents as full information as we can give you in response to your question on such short notice. We would be very glad, however, to supplement this with more data if you desire.

ARMOUR & Co.

COLD-STORAGE HOLDINGS.

[Compilation of United States Bureau of Markets statistics.]

Case eggs: July 1, 1919, 7,508,530 cases, or 225,255,900 dozen; July 1, 1918, 6,410,384 cases, or 192,311,520 dozen.

On July 1 storage stocks of eggs are at their maximum. The amount in storage represents a considerable proportion of the next seven months' supply. The amount in storage July 1, 1919, represents about 2 dozen eggs per capita, not allowing anything for spoilage.

The annual production of eggs is estimated at 2,500,000,000 dozen.

Creamery butter:	Pounds.
July 1, 1919	87,851,371
July 1, 1918	47,919,035

This represents about three-fourths pound per capita.

Annual production creamery butter estimated at 1,500,000,000 pounds.

Cheese (all kinds):	Pounds.
July 1, 1919	48,727,201
July 1, 1918	29,290,983

Less than one-half pound per capita. Annual production cheese, estimated, 400,000,000 pounds.

Cheese is customarily carried in storage for curing, some kinds being carried for more than one year.

Poultry (all kinds):	Pounds.
July 1, 1919	48,895,704
July 1, 1918	16,984,864

Less than one-half pound per capita.

July 1, 1919:	Pounds.
Frozen beef	162,386,570
Cured beef	29,217,586
Frozen lamb and mutton	7,273,201
Frozen pork	153,894,023
Dry salt pork	380,462,828
Pickled pork	421,507,966
Total above meats	1,154,742,174

July 1, 1918:
Frozen beef	146,672,220
Cured beef	21,527,827
Frozen lamb and mutton	2,359,359
Frozen pork	94,332,361
Dry salt pork	400,764,197
Pickled pork	361,568,840
Total above meats	1,027,224,804

These figures include meats in process of curing, the time of curing being 60 days or more.

The annual production of meat is estimated at from 12,000,000,000 to 15,000,000,000 pounds.

The amount of all kinds above listed would be about 10 pounds per capita.

CHICAGO, ILL., August 13, 1919.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Acknowledging wire; due to not having yet seen complete statement McKELLAR charge and statistics can only comment on them generally. Will say, however, that the Cudahy Packing Co. is entirely independent and in severe competition with all other packers, particularly those larger than ourselves. There is no monopoly either in meat or packing house, and certainly not in cold storage. Our company, of course, requires refrigeration in connection with packing houses and proper preparation of meats; also refrigeration necessary in shipment of perishable products; also many branch houses are refrigerated to properly protect fresh meats for consumers, but we have practically no storage space and none outside our packing houses and branches. We store a relative amount of goods compared to the general volume of our business. Storage only takes place in seasons when surplus is offered on markets, as for instance canner cattle in the fall, eggs in the early spring, and creamery butter in early grazing season. Our stocks at the present time are abnormally low. Our company's total tonnage annually exceeds 1,200,000,000 pounds, all products. We estimate weekly beef consumption United States fifty to seventy-five million pounds. In recent months total United States export of provision has exceeded 75,000,000 pounds weekly. Anyone who compares this enormous weekly export and consumption with official Bureau of Markets figures on stocks on hand can reach no other conclusion that we are even now in a shortage of sufficient food figures of stocks on hand. Can reach no other conclusion than that we are even now in a shortage of sufficient food for the world to carry until next spring.

If the packers were able to make as profit one-half cent per pound, it would be a very high profit. They do not make this. We regard it as absurd to charge that any willful shortage of goods to sustain a market price as against the cost of the goods spoiled, the loss would be overwhelming. Can not understand any basis for this charge that any large interests refuse to sell at existing prices. Our house is in the market constantly both buying and selling at market price. We handle so many kinds and cuts of meats and other products that could not possibly give you understandable figures in detail over the wire, but taking principal items which include pork and other meats in process of cure, which requires 60 to 90 days, and the stocks in storage now compare as follows with previous years: Total cut meats July 31, 1917, in Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Joseph, Milwaukee, St. Louis, and East St. Louis were 340,000,000 pounds. At same points July 31, 1918, were 383,000,000 pounds. On June 30, this year, were 407,000,000 pounds, and July 31 were 384,000,000 pounds. As stated, largest portion of these amounts would be in process of preparation. As a matter of fact, there is no surplus now in storage or elsewhere, and the world does not have a 90-day food supply on hand. Such stocks as are in storage are butter, eggs, meats, and everything else; need to be husbanded, rather than disposed of, or else tremendous shortage will result even before winter. Of course, proposition that group can control law of supply and demand is absurd, but no group or individual in the packing business works to that end. United States Bureau of Markets publishes regular figures which are quite reliable. Please compare them with what I have given with all packers for markets named and you will see how we estimated export of provisions and normal domestic consumption of certainly 45,000,000 weekly provisions and much more than 50,000,000 beef. The statistics as reported by Bureau of Markets are insignificant for further requirements. Appreciate your calling on us. We expect to be heard before Agricultural Committee later. Sorry can not give you more over the wire.

E. A. CUDAHY.

CHICAGO, August 13, 1919.

Hon. JAMES REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Answering your wire just received, will say most positively that the five big packers have no monopoly through cold storage. Morris & Co. has but one cold-storage plant outside of our small plant freezers. Both the buying and selling of the packers are regulated absolutely by the law of supply and demand. Morris & Co. has not allowed one pound of meat to spoil because of existing prices. Our purchases of live meat animals were much larger this year than last. We will collect and forward you the requested figures at the earliest possible moment, this afternoon if possible, to-morrow morning at the outside. Of course, you understand that ordinarily more than half of our stock in cold storage is in process of manufacture. You may rest assured that the storage situation is normal so far as Morris & Co. are concerned. Our books are open on this or any other phase of our business. We will gladly comply with any request that you may make for any information whatever in connection with our business.

EDWARD MORRIS,
President Morris & Co.

CHICAGO, August 14, 1919.

Hon. JAMES REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Further answering your wire of yesterday, our beef carried in storage at this time aggregates 2,971,000 pounds, all of which has been sold and is awaiting shipment, as against 16,300,000 pounds in storage at this time last year. Our cut meats, consisting almost entirely of chucks, rounds, sausage meats, offal, etc., is 19,161,000 pounds, as against 18,184,000 pounds last year. We only have a million pounds of poultry in cold storage at this time. We have no fish whatever in cold storage either at this time or at this time last year. We have a net stock of 58,708,000 pounds of provisions at the present time, as against a stock of 54,261,000 pounds last year, but practically all of this is in the process of cure. You will thus see that we had in storage and process of cure 88,766,000 pounds last year, as against 81,875,000 pounds at the present time. The exports of beef and pork for the month of June last year, which are the latest available figures, amount to 425,211,000 pounds. The entire stock of Morris & Co. in storage would not feed the people of this country more than two days. Hope we have answered fully. Please advise if you want any further information within our power; we are at your service and our books are open.

EDWARD MORRIS,
President Morris & Co.

CHICAGO, ILL., August 14, 1919.

Senator JAMES REED,
Washington, D. C.:

Knowing you are interested in cold-storage problems that are coming up at the present time, I am sending you statement I gave out in regard to seizure of seven cars of eggs we had at Chattanooga by the United States district attorney. I can not imagine why the United States district attorney seized 2,800 cases of eggs, of 30 dozen each, at Chattanooga belonging to Morris & Co. This is about one-third of the number of eggs which we had in cold storage at that point this time last year, and yet we did not have enough last year for our regular trade. We supply practically all of our branch houses in southeastern territories from Chattanooga. These eggs were stored in the months of April, May, and June during the producing season, as is always done, and we intended to market them in the months of October, November, and December, which are the months of small productions. These eggs cost us 39.96 cents per dozen on the average going into storage, and with the average storage charges of 1½ cents per dozen, interest and insurance four-tenths cent per dozen, the eggs now stand us 41.86 cents per dozen. The present market price of storage eggs at Chattanooga is 40 cents per dozen. This is not the natural or ordinary time to market storage eggs. Morris & Co. are not hoarding eggs. This is demonstrated by the fact that Morris & Co. has in cold storage fewer eggs than what they had this time last year and our total amount in cold storage at present time represents a very small fraction over 1 per cent of the total amount of eggs in cold storage in this country, although the receipts of eggs have been larger this year than last. If all the storage eggs of this country were put on the market it would probably cause a temporary break in the market and the total amount of eggs would only be about 2 dozen for each person and would last from two to three weeks. However, in the fall and winter, when the production is small, the price of eggs would necessarily go very much higher and could easily reach $1 per dozen. This is manifestly not in the interest of the consumer. There was absolutely nothing in the situation at Chattanooga to justify the seizure of these eggs.

EDWARD MORRIS,
President Morris & Co.

When you read these messages I believe you will come to the same conclusion reached by a committee on which I once served, that there is a great deal of misapprehension about cold storage in this country. I will say, by way of interlude, that I was on the committee when they had the Heyburn bill before them for investigation. I remember that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was on the subcommittee that heard the evidence. For a number of days—I think it ran into the weeks—we took testimony. I know that I went on the committee as much prejudiced against cold storage as a man could well be. When we got through with the hearings I made up my mind that while there might occasionally be some abuses at that time—and I am speaking of that period which is some years ago—there was nothing that would warrant the character of legislation that was proposed and that that character of legislation would increase the prices to every consumer in the United States; and I believe other Senators approaching this matter candidly and carefully will come to similar conclusions or modifications of opinion.

I desire now, Mr. President, to call attention to the question of governmental control; and here I want to say that while we may not know it to a very large extent we are under governmental control to-day as to prices, and to a very large extent the things that we are complaining of as being too high in price are absolutely not only subject to Government control but are controlled.

We have a licensing system by which every man engaged in business of any magnitude can be licensed and has been licensed, and that licensing system, as construed, has gone to the extent of fixing the prices by fixing the profits. I believe that it has been stretched far beyond anything Congress contemplated; but, discussing it in its stretched and extended form, we find that this is true:

The right was given to license dealers in sugar. That right was employed so that the sugar was controlled from the producer to the consumer. It went to the wholesaler, and he was required to sell to the retailer upon certain terms. Then, although there was no right to license the retailer, the wholesaler was told that if he sold to a retailer who did not comply with the regulations of the food control he, the wholesaler, could not have any more sugar. Accordingly they laid down the rule for the little retailer, who was not under license and was not under control, and enforced it just as thoroughly as they did against the big dealer who was under license. It was war time. I am not discussing at this time the question whether it ought to have been employed or not; but it was employed, and to-day the power to license exists, and to-day the laws upon the statute books give the most plenary and tremendous powers to our Government, and for the most part prices are now largely governmental prices.

I did not discuss this matter in connection with meat, but it is well known that the Food Administration met with the packers and agreed upon the prices they were to receive, and that the prices for the products at both ends were fixed. It is a well-known fact that this has been done with wheat; that the millers' prices have been controlled; that although Congress never in the world gave the right to fix a maximum price on the farmer's wheat, but only provided a minimum, only gave him a guaranteed price, yet the licensing power was so employed that the grain dealer was told that his license would be taken away if he paid more than the price stipulated by the Food Administration, and accordingly, if he paid a cent more, he lost his license and went out of business; so that the farmer, having nobody else to sell to but him and the miller, had that market taken away. Then the miller was told that he could only buy from the regular grain dealer or from a farmer who hauled his wheat in his wagon, and that he must pay the price the grain dealer fixed, and the grain dealer was required to fix a price at a certain figure, so that the price on the farmer's wheat was fixed, although there never was a line of law authorizing the fixation of prices. It was fixed because the only two American markets he had were controlled by license. The price on flour was correspondingly fixed to the miller. There was a third place where a farmer might have sold his wheat, and that was for shipment abroad; so the Grain Corporation was organized, and it was granted a monopoly of shipment abroad. So that there was no place left on this earth for the American farmer to sell his wheat except to these controlled sources, and in that way the price of wheat was fixed.

I am not going to discuss the merits of it. I am not here for the present time to make complaint about it; but I am here to say that the price of wheat, the price of flour to-day, the profits of the miller, and the profits of all the middlemen clear down to the dealer and the wholesaler are fixed to-day by the Government. What is the use, then, of complaining about the price that we pay or looking for further relief by more control laws when the control is here and the thing is absolutely in the Government's hands to-day? Yet the American citizen who pays 10 cents for his loaf of bread and thinks he ought to have it for 5, although his wages may be higher than they were before, believes that the Government is powerless and that we have to have more legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a couple of questions for information. I understand that the price of wheat fixed by the Government was $2.26 a bushel. Is that right?

Mr. REED. I think it averages to the farmer about $1.80, but there is a price for a very high grade of wheat. Now, I can not tell the Senator whether it is $2.26 or $2.20.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was fixed at $2.26 at what they call the primary markets, was it not?

Mr. REED. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is wheat selling for now in Kansas City and in Chicago?

Mr. REED. I assume that it is selling for that, less the discount. I have not looked at it. If it is above that, then the control has been relaxed within the last few days.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to ask the Senator if he was not aware of the fact that wheat has been selling higher than that, and for quite a while?

Mr. REED. If that is true, it is a recent action of the Grain Corporation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about that.

Mr. REED. I know that during the larger period of the war the other statement was true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am compelled to believe that some corporation somewhere has done it. Now, then, with wheat at $2.26, or selling at a higher price, what was the differential between wheat and flour, and what would that have brought flour to by the barrel, or some sort of flour made out of this wheat at the primary market, and what is flour selling for now?

Mr. REED. That is an involved question. It takes four and a half bushels of wheat of a good grade to make a barrel of flour.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that, but I thought maybe the Senator had noticed the quotations.

Mr. REED. No; I have not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has been discussing this matter and informing the Senate about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I answer the Senator's question in reference to the price of wheat?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a matter of fact, I think, that flour is selling for very much more than the differential.

Mr. REED. Just one moment. If that is true, then this Government control that was complete has been voluntarily relaxed. That is the point I am making. You do not need more law to remedy a thing where the power exists and has existed, and that is all that I am arguing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My question was not directed to the success or failure of the attempt to use the governmental power. It was directed to the assertion just made by the Senator, that the price of wheat and of flour were absolutely being controlled by the Government now.

Mr. REED. Well, if the Senator gets any satisfaction out of splitting that hair, let him have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not split it. I think the Senator from Missouri split it.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I had a wire from the chairman of the Grain Corporation in answer to the question whether or not the buyers were paying more for wheat than the Government price. He advised me that in the West they were paying from 30 to 40 cents more a bushel for the lower grades, and the market shows that they are paying from 40 to 50 cents a bushel more for the higher grades in other places.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then that simply brings us to this: That they did have power and they did exercise power during the entire period of the war to keep the price of grain within certain limits; that they did fix the amount of profit that the dealers on the boards of trade were to have; that they did fix the profits of the miller. They have that power to-day. If they have relaxed the rule, and if the price of wheat has gone up, the reason for that advance is that the market of the world is drawing the wheat from this country, and they are letting the law of supply and demand to some extent operate. No other reason could be logically assigned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For the information of the Senator, I desire to say that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, advised the Senate about a week ago that the current market prices were considerably in advance of the guaranteed price, and he gave us the figures at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Three dollars and something, I think.

Mr. REED. That only demonstrates that of all the men in the world whose prices were held down during the war the chief was the farmer, and it does demonstrate that that kind of a control can hold prices down if it is complete enough.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator contend that the price of sugar has been held down? Does he contend that the price of eggs or poultry or beef or coal has been held down?

Mr. REED. I am talking about wheat, and I am going to talk about coal and sugar now. The Senator from Mississippi comes into the Chamber, hears a little of what another Senator says, and then he proceeds to argue some other question. I am only devoting myself to-day to one thing——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. REED. I want to conclude. The Senator is arguing a question I have not been discussing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been listening to the Senator from Missouri for half an hour.

Mr. REED. The Senator is arguing a question which is entirely foreign to what I have been arguing, and, Mr. President, I intend to go on.

I do not propose to be drawn into side lines to discuss the question of just what the market is in wheat to-day. I am discussing the proposition that the Government control of these things is absolute. If they have relaxed it, they have done it recently. The fact remains nevertheless that there is the same law to control that they exercised in the most absolute form. That is all I am discussing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that is all the Senator is discussing, there is no dispute between us, but I understood the Senator to say that the present prices of meat products were due to Government control now existing.

Mr. REED. Very well. Perhaps I made that statement a shade broad, but I do not hesitate to say, sir, that Government control even as now exercised has a great deal to do with it, for I have put into the RECORD the statement of Mr. Julius C. Barnes, showing that our governmental agencies have been employed to send hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat to Europe and that they are engaged in doing it now. Of course, if they assist in creating that European competition, and particularly if they take American dollars to do it, and bidding against the ordinary market here, prices will go up unless they are held down by an arbitrary hand. There ought to be no difference between the Senator and myself about that.

Mr. President, let us come to another instance of control. Take coal.

COAL.

Fluctuation in the price of coal well illustrates the general rise of prices which has occurred since the war began and at the same time, in my opinion, exposes both the virtues and vices of governmental control.

Whatever conclusions the advocates of each system may draw as to the wisdom of governmental control, the bald fact stands out that at the present time without Government control the prices are substantially the same as they were when Government exercised a complete dominion over the coal trade.

Here again I find that while we are complaining to-day of high prices and proposing governmental control as a remedy, that we are as well off without that control as we were when we had it.

One thing should be noted that since Government control was relaxed, prices of coal, while on the average the same, have now adjusted themselves so that quality is taken into consideration.

As to the general rise in prices as illustrated by coal, I give a table showing the price of bituminous coal at tidewater from the Federal Reserve Bulletin, July, 1919:

Year.	Average price
1914	$2.20
1915	2.20
1916	2.20

It will be noted that coal rose to an abnormal point in May, 1917. The evidence shows that this was the result of a coal panic, but these prices speedily adjusted themselves even without regulation. I should say not a complete adjustment, but a partial adjustment. By the month of April the readjustment had begun and by a voluntary agreement prices were reduced by the 1st of July. This voluntary agreement was temporary and it was understood that further adjustments would be made.

The Government then took control in August and the price was reduced to $3.85, but the Government was immediately compelled to raise prices. They ran from $4.10 to $4 and were approximately at that figure when the Government relinquished control on February 1, 1919, and are at that figure to-day, or substantially at that figure.

Anthracite coal furnishes a still better illustration of the fact that we benefited little from Government control. The table shows that in May, 1917, with an open market anthracite was selling at tidewater, New York, at $5.68. Yet, in May, 1918, under Government control it had advanced to $6.30, and in February of this year, when the Government relinquished control, it was bringing $7.95. It is now selling for approximately that price.

In support of these statements I quote from a letter furnished by the Geological Survey under date of August 13, 1919:

It is believed that the average price now being realized on all bituminous coal sold is not far from what it would be if the same coal were sold at the various Government prices formerly in effect, although, as stated above, some coals are selling above that standard and some below. * * *

Government restrictions having been removed and supply and demand controlling the situation, quality again became the determining factor in the price of bituminous coal. * * *

Dr. Garfield stated that had Government regulation continued he would probably have found it necessary to add 50 cents more to the price of domestic sizes in order to insure the operators their cost—

And so forth. I present the entire letter for the RECORD.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, August 13, 1919.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR REED: I take pleasure in sending the memorandum just prepared by Mr. Lesher, the geologist in charge of our coal statistics. In the third paragraph you will see mention of a recent increase in wage scale in two fields, and it might be noted that these are non-union fields—the Washington wage agreement referred to in the first paragraph being the union agreement. This is not in violation thereof.

I also inclose the memorandum regarding the prices for anthracite coal, the substance of which was telephoned you this morning. If there is anything further that you wish to learn Mr. Lesher and myself will be glad to assist you.

Yours, very cordially, GEO. OTIS SMITH, Director.

Mr. C. E. Lesher, of the Geological Survey, states as follows:

"Wages of bituminous coal mine labor fixed by the Washington agreement in October, 1917, have not been changed since that date. The Washington agreement, between the United Mine Workers, the operators, and the United States Fuel Administrator, is to remain in effect until peace is promulgated.

"Wages of anthracite mine labor, as fixed by the War Labor Board in conjunction with the Fuel Administrator on November 1, 1918, are still in effect.

"Price restrictions on both bituminous coal and anthracite, under the Lever Act, were removed by the Fuel Administrator February 1, 1919, and there have been no advances nor changes in rates of wages to mine labor—bituminous or anthracite—since that date, except that on August 1, 1919, operators in the Pocahontas and New River fields voluntarily increased the scale of wages for mine labor in those two fields by an amount stated to be the largest wage increase ever granted in those fields. It is reported that the new scale means an increase of 30 to 53 cents per ton in the cost of production. The working day was at the same time decreased from nine to eight hours.

"Although the demand for both anthracite and bituminous was very low in February, when the price and other regulations of the Fuel Administration were removed, there was exhibited from the beginning a tendency to increase in the prices of the higher grade and most desirable grades of bituminous coals and a corresponding decrease in the prices of the lower grades of bituminous coal. This tendency became more marked in the months succeeding the removal of the Government regulations and is now quite noticeable. The higher grades of coal, such as the Pocahontas, New River, Fairmont gas coal, Somerset coal, Pittsburgh, high-grade lump in Alabama, Illinois, and Indiana, and generally the best coals, particularly the selected lump sizes, are now selling above the prices established by the Fuel Administration, while the medium and lower-grade coals, and especially the screenings or slack in all fields, are not bringing the former Government prices. It is believed that the average price now being realized on all bituminous coal sold is not far from what it would be if the same coal were sold at the various Government prices formerly in effect, although, as stated above, some coals are selling above that standard and some below.

"The Government prices on coal were by law determined entirely on the basis of the cost of production and had no regard to quality, relative demand, or nearness to market. It so happens that Pocahontas and Pittsburgh and some, but not all, of the other high-grade coals cost less to produce than lower-grade coals in near-by fields. When the demand for coal fell off after the armistice, consumers immediately began to pick and choose with the result that the high-grade coals were in demand even though the whole market was slack, while the poorer grades for a considerable time could not be marketed at all. In other words, Government restrictions having been removed and supply and demand controlling the situation, quality again became the determining factor in the price of bituminous coal. That is the situation to-day.

"Anthracite mine labor was granted an increase in wages on November 1, 1918, and the Fuel Administrator allowed an advance in the price of domestic sizes of anthracite as of that date of $1.05 per ton to cover the increased cost of labor. When he announced the removal of the Government prices, on February 1, Dr. Garfield in a published statement declared that his allowance of $1.05 had not been adequate to cover the increased cost of labor granted the previous November, and that he had not at that time been willing to pass on to the public the full amount of the added cost accruing from the wage advance. Dr. Garfield stated that had Government regulation continued he would probably have found it necessary to add 50 cents more to the price of domestic sizes in order to insure the operators their cost. When the price was removed on February 1 the larger anthracite companies continued as their circular prices those in effect immediately prior—in January. The independent companies which had from the beginning been allowed a differential in their favor of 75 cents a ton on prepared sizes (originally determined by the President on the advice of the Federal Trade Commission, and continued in effect by the Fuel Administrator) in February announced that their prices would be the same as those of the larger companies, thereby voluntarily renouncing the 75-cent differential. In March the larger companies announced that beginning May 1 the prices of domestic sizes of anthracite would be advanced 10 cents a ton each month, until in September the price of 50 cents above the last Government price had been reach. The independents have on different dates reassumed the 75-cent differential and in many instances are exceeding it by amounts of 25, 50, and 75 cents a ton, making the differential in their favor over the companies $1 to $1.50. The demand for domestic sizes of anthracite is to-day such that they have practically little difficulty in disposing of it at these advance figures."

I also present a table showing the prices of coal at tidewater, taken from the Coal Age of August 7.

Quotations for company white ash coals per gross ton at the mines f. o. b. New York tidewater lower ports during August follow:

	Mine.	Tidewater.
Broken	$5.95	$7.80
Egg	6.25	8.10
Stove	6.50	8.35
Chestnut	6.60	8.45
Pea	5.20	6.95
Buckwheat	3.40	5.15
Rice	2.75	4.50
Barley	2.25	4.00

It must not, however, be forgotten that the control by the Coal Administration was accompanied, as all will remember, by fatally defective distribution. Millions of tons of coal in excess of any amount theretofore used in the Northwest were sent to that part of the country, while insufficient coal reached New York and other ports to bunker ships. In many parts of the country the people were without coal for domestic use. In Ohio, which is abundantly supplied with coal mines, the distribution was so defective that they could not obtain coal to supply their thrashing machines with coal.

It will also be remembered that one of the orders of the Fuel Administration was for all factories east of the Mississippi River to close down for 14 days' time. Theaters were shut up. Churches were compelled to close their doors.

According to a table prepared for Mr. McAdoo by W. P. Manse, industrial agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, the loss is estimated at from eight to ten billion dollars.

I put in the RECORD a newspaper clipping giving an account of this report:

WORKLESS MONDAY COST THE NATION OVER FOUR BILLIONS.

In 18 of the principal manufacturing cities of the country the money loss from Dr. Garfield's celebrated shutdown order amounted to $4,344,070,000 in workmen's wages and manufacturing products, according to a table prepared for Director General of Railroads McAdoo by W. P. Manse, industrial agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

The same table presents figures to show that the car shortage since it began in September, 1916, has caused a total loss of not less than $8,000,000,000 and maybe as much as $10,000,000,000.

A statement issued by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress says that "for the past 18 months the traffic history of this country has been one continuous succession of delays, congestion, embargoes, and car shortage."

Three hundred and seventy-six million tons of freight were handled on the waterways of the country in 1916, enough to fill four times as many freight cars as the country owns to-day. This shows, the River and Harbors Congress statement declares, "that the waterways are still of some service, even after 50 years of cutthroat competition by the railroads."

This appalling loss well illustrates the danger involved in taking the business out of the hands of men who created it and turning it over to the control of men who neither created a business nor are capable of its management after it has been created by the industry of others.

Going back to the question of coal, I do not know what the present winter will bring. I do know it is said that under the railroad management to-day there is an insufficient amount of cars to carry the tonnage of the country, and there may be another coal shortage.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It may interest the Senator to know that only to-day there was a representative of the Massachusetts State government in this city trying to find some way of relieving the shortage of coal the coming winter, it being generally believed that there will be as great a coal shortage this fall and winter as at any time in years past.

Mr. REED. I hope that will prove to be a mistake; but I would be unfair if I did not say that there were excessive coal prices before the war began that seemed to demand some kind of action. I believe that excess would have regulated itself in a short time; but I do not care to argue that. The only point I am trying to bring out to-day is that the prices we are having to pay to-day for coal are no more than they were when the Government relaxed control; and, of course, the same kind of control exists to-day as has existed at any previous period.

SUGAR.

Mr. President, let us now look at the sugar situation and see whether the people have benefited by the control there. Of course, we meet the old assertion that the price of sugar would have gone to any figure. I do not intend to argue that, but I do intend to say that, although completely controlled to-day, the price of sugar has risen as much as the price of any other great staple article that is in common and general use. I am not here to argue for the present that that has not been the result of natural conditions. What I am seeking to impress as I go along is that these great fundamental natural conditions can not be defied or set aside. They must be recognized.

Let us take the question of sugar.

Again, it is not my purpose at this moment to discuss the question that the price of sugar might or might not have gone to the highest level without governmental control. That matter is reserved for a later time. It may be, however, safely asserted that the fluctuations in the price of sugar show—

(a) That sugar responded to a general world advance in price.

(b) That this price increased during governmental control.

(c) That notwithstanding all of the hardships and inconveniences that were put upon our people, governmental control did not reduce the consumption of sugar materially.

On August 15, 1917, Mr. George M. Rolph, head of the Hawaiian sugar industry, was appointed chief of the sugar division of the Food Administration. The control dates substantially from that time and continues up to the present. The control of sugar has been complete and absolute. It began in the cane fields and ended with the ultimate consumer. Even at this time sugar control, which is both national and international, exists. How it is operated may be illustrated by the march in prices as shown by the following table.

These tables are taken from the History of Prices During the War, compiled by the Department of Commerce as "international price comparisons":

Mr. President, I put this table in and have it printed, but for the information of the Senate as I proceed I call attention to the fact that the New York price for granulated sugar in 1913 was $4 and a fraction per 100 pounds, or a little over 4 cents a pound; in 1914 it was 4.7 cents a pound; in 1915 it was 5.5 cents a pound; in 1916, 6.8 cents per pound; and in 1917, when the food control began, it mounted to 7.7 cents per pound. It has continued to run between 6 and a fraction and 8 or 9.40 cents a pound up to the present time. We are confronted also with a threatened sugar shortage in Chicago, where they are bidding 12 and 13 cents a pound. I put in a table showing these fluctuations in prices. Senators should bear in mind that this commodity is still under Government control, and, as I have stated, that control is absolute and complete.

The principal supply of sugar for this country and the largest source of supply for the world comes from Cuba. The price on Cuban sugar fixes the price on Louisiana cane sugar and the beet sugar of this country as well as the Hawaiian crop.

According to the testimony of Mr. Rolph, Mr. Hoover's agent, on page 76 of the hearings on the shortage of sugar, Senate Committee on Manufactures, the prewar normal price of Cuban sugar was $4.04 per 100 pounds, duty paid. In 1917 the sugar control fixed the price on Cuban sugar at $6.90; that is, they sent down to Cuba and fixed the prices for the raisers of raw sugar far in advance of any prices that have ever been paid for raw sugar in the history of the world. In November they reduced the price to $5.92 and in December they advanced it to $6.55. In June, 1918, it was $6.055. On September 9, 1918, it was $7.28, and on September 13, 1918, it was $6.90. The price to-day, August 11, 1919, is $7.28 to the refiners. The prewar price was $4.04.

Yet here is a governmental agency, an international sugar-control agency, that controlled every ship that hauled the sugar, and controlled every market to which the sugar could go, and yet they raised the price to the Cuban planter from $4.04 to $7.28. When that is being done by governmental agencies themselves in a matter where they are supreme and absolute, will somebody tell me why we complain if prices rise elsewhere, and what remedy we expect to get by increasing governmental control? The fact is, if you ask these gentlemen to account for raising these rates in the market where they had an absolute monopoly of purchase there would be only one answer they could make, and that is that the law of supply and demand was operating and that they had to respond to it. That is what I am arguing. The law of supply and demand moves forward with resistless force. You may control it temporarily, you may check it for the moment, but in the end you can no more stop it than you can stop the longings of the human heart or dam up the tides of human passion.

Bear in mind that the International Sugar Committee consisted of Sir Joseph White Todd and J. Ramsey Drake, appointed by the Allies; Mr. Earl D. Babst, president of the American Sugar Refining Co., commonly known as the "trust," and William A. Jamison, of Arbuckle Bros. Co., were the two American members. Mr. George M. Rolph, head of the sugar division of the Food Control, was the fifth member of the commission. Mr. Rolph was also head of the Hawaiian sugar industry at the time he was appointed. These were the sugar kings of the world, brought together because of their expert knowledge, and yet as a result of that expert knowledge they substantially doubled the price of raw sugars to the planter in Cuba, and that meant a substantial doubling of the price to the Louisiana cane-sugar man and to the beet-sugar man of this country—beet-sugar factories and not beet raisers.

This organization, together with the United States Sugar Equalization Co., constituted the market for raw sugar, equalized its distribution, and completely controlled all the tonnage available for sugar shipments, and therefore had opportunity to fix the price at will, subject only to the fact that if the price was fixed too low production would be lessened. Nevertheless for some reason, which we must assume they felt justified in acting upon, they increased the price over 60 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My understanding about the matter at the time was that that was the very purpose, namely, to increase the price of sugar in order to stimulate the production of it. The Senator will very well remember that, as it was, we were all put upon rations, so far as sugar was concerned, and every effort was made by the Food Administration and by every other department of the Government to stimulate the production of sugar. Of course, the most effective method of stimulating it was to raise prices.

Mr. REED. I am not quarreling with that statement for the present. Indeed, that is what I have been saying in substance—that their reason and excuse for raising the price in Cuba must have been to make a demand. Get more sugar raised, therefore pay higher prices and get it raised.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It did work that way.

Mr. REED. I do not think it produced any very substantial result. That is the unfortunate part of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is that the production in Cuba, and particularly in Porto Rico, jumped in the most extraordinary way.

Mr. REED. No; the production in Cuba was going to be marvelous, as everybody in Cuba said—not in acreage so much as a better crop.

I am not quarreling with that. I think the facts, however, will show that there was not any corresponding increase in acreage, as we might have hoped; but for the present I am not discussing the wisdom of the act. I am discussing the fact that the Government being in control did vastly increase the price, and I am assuming that it was done for a virtuous reason, and that reason to be the great law of supply and demand, which is the theme I am discussing. I am trying to show that governmental control can only set it aside temporarily.

The effect of sugar control is further illustrated by the facts as to the average profits on that article. Here I am coming to the question of profiteering. Constantly we find men protesting until they are black in the face about profits and profiteers. How has this thing worked out under governmental control? The Government called together the great sugar refiners of this country; it ascertained what their average profit for refining sugar was; and then it proceeded to agree with them on practically twice the profit they had ever made. This is the first fruit of governmental control. Here are the figures:

The average differential or profit made by the great sugar refiners was given by some of them at 70 cents and by some of them as high as 85 cents; but let us take 85 cents, which was to be their profit per hundred pounds. When they made that profit they made it if they won. They had to take the chances of the market; they had to take the chance of the price going up and down on the raw materials which they had bought. Accordingly they had to take the chances of bankruptcy. But the price which they were now to receive was a fixed price. They obtained their sugar at a given price, and they sold it at a given price, and nobody could say them nay. It was, therefore, a guaranteed profit.

The first differential allowed them was $1.30 instead of their former profit of 85 cents, which they made as an average. This additional price was carried over to the consumer. Later it was raised to $1.40, and in August, 1918, to $1.45. At the end of 1918 it was again raised to $1.54. So under Government control, the most absolute that has ever been exercised on any article that was used by a free people, the Government consented, first, to the payment of a profit to the producers of the raw sugar in Cuba nearly twice the original price, and then consented to pay to the refiner nearly twice his original differential and gave him at the same time what amounted to a guaranteed profit. All this was added to the price of sugar as it reached the consumer.

You may take any staple article that was not controlled—I will not say any article but the average of the uncontrolled articles—and you will find that none of them mounted in price more rapidly than did sugar. I am not at the present time arguing that there was anything wicked about that. I am arguing the fact that the irresistible law of supply and demand was working; the Government control did not set it aside; and it will not set it aside in the future.

Mr. President, I shall print in the RECORD a table showing the prices and fluctuations in the prices of sugar, beginning in 1913 at 9.9 cents a pound. The price in New York City for the refined sugar in April, 1919, with full Government control, was 10 cents a pound, notwithstanding that in the meantime bottoms have been released from war service, so that the accumulated stock of sugar in Java and other parts of the world have been released; and this is an international control where the iron hand of our Allies, united with our own, completely holds the situation.

I now ask that the table to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. REED. The price to-day is 11 cents, with great threat of rise.

Mr. President, our people were rationed; sugar was badly distributed; panicky conditions existed for over a year. In some parts of the country there was an absolute failure of supply. The people were told just how they could buy sugar and how much they could buy, and where they could buy it. The ordinary housewife who went down to buy a pound of sugar had to undergo an examination such as a suspect does when he is dragged into the police court and given the "third degree."

Mr. President, what was the net result of all that? I remember stating on this floor at the time that you could talk about a sugar shortage until you made everybody want sugar, and now, behold, what has developed? I hold in my hand the annual report of the American Sugar Refining Co.—the great trust. At its head is Mr. Earl D. Babst, who was also at the head of the Government International Sugar Control. He comes to us surrounded by the odor of sanctity, because he was one of the officials who were selected by Mr. Hoover to perform this work; and yet he tells us this:

Contrary to curent belief and notwithstanding the limitations imposed upon consumption, we have consumed in 1918 an amount almost equal to the yearly average of the last decade. Consumption has approximated 10,000 tons a day, or at the rate of 300,000 tons a month, which is about the average normal consumption during the past 10 years. While it is true that many have stinted themselves, for others the rationing has acted as a stimulus to buy. The saving effected by conservation has been to a considerable degree offset by the increased purchases of those who, because of the publicity given to sugar restrictions, bought more than they otherwise would. Necessarily the rationing was administered horizontally throughout the United States, and while the normal consumption of certain localities was reduced, in others the ration was in excess of normal. Accordingly, while certain areas were limited in their consumption, the effect in others was to increase the purchases.

So, Mr. President, as the end of all the rationing and all the inconvenience, we ate just as much sugar as we ever did. They told us that the rationing system was a wonderful success; they told us that as a result of it our Allies were receiving sugar in vast quantities; that whereas Tommy Atkins and the poilu had formerly sat in the trenches in the rain and longed for sugar, now each of them was supplied with a pocketful of the lucious edible, and that between shots they were engaged in devouring it and getting fat. It seems, however, we did not save a pound, according to the statement of Mr. Babst, who came mighty near being the brainest man they had in their whole organization.

What else do we find about governmental control? While we are lecturing profiteers, let us think a litttle about ourselves. We find that the United States Grain Corporation in these hard times could not resist speculating in grain or increasing the price. So some twenty-three odd million dollars they put on as a profit. This Government agency, employed for the purpose of keeping prices down, could not resist the temptation of profiteering a little for themselves. Of course, they did not take the money; it will go back to the Government after big salaries are paid; but the money that goes back to the Government came out of the pockets of the people who used the wheat.

It seems that this passion of governmental or bureaucratic profiteering is almost universal. The United States Sugar Equalization Co. control took over the sugar crop, and said to the refiners that they must take it from the sugar-control company at an advanced price, and accordingly they have made a profit, according to a telegram I have here, of somewhere between twenty-five and thirty million dollars. While the women of the land were trying to buy sugar and finding it high priced, and while we were clamoring everywhere for a reduction in price and crying out against the profiteer, these two governmental institutions, set up for the purpose of controlling prices for the benefit of the people, were taking down in the aggregate approximately from $45,000,000 to $55,000,000 as profit.

That only bears—and I do not say it to speak of them with great harshness, although I think the proceeding wholly unjustifiable—out the fact that, somehow or other, you can not keep men who are dealing in commodities from trying to make profits; and if Government agencies themselves profiteered with the people's money and charged the extra profits to the people, it is not astonishing if we find private individuals who advanced prices. The example was not a good one.

Mr. President, I have tried to show the effect of the law of supply and demand and that there is a shortage of supply because of world conditions growing out of the war, for which, certainly, we were not responsible and into which we were unfortunately drawn.

There is another cause as general, as universal, and as powerful in the matter of the increasing prices as the law of supply and demand, and when I have discussed that, as I intend to do very briefly, I shall be glad to yield the floor. That cause I have already mentioned. It is that a radical increase in the number of dollars in circulation results in a decrease in the purchasing power of the dollar; that is to say, if the dollar is low the price measured by dollars will be high. The rule is thus laid down by Profs. Fisher and Kammerer:

> The prices of commodities are dependent upon the money in circulation, multiplied by the velocity of circulation, plus the credits (bank deposits subject to check) multiplied by their velocity of circulation.

That is to say, the volume of money, together with the rapidity with which it moves; the amount of credit money, checks, drafts, and so forth, based upon deposits, together with their rapidity of movement, fixes the price of commodities.

Mr. President, it is now generally admitted that that law is correct, and let me, if you please, apply it to present conditions. Before I do so I call attention to the fact that Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University, agrees in substance with this law. This is the day of college professors——

Mr. THOMAS. I think no one now denies it, although it was denied very strenuously in 1896.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is correct. I will insert Prof. Seligman's statement in the RECORD without pausing to read it. It is as follows:

> It is obvious, then, that apart from the minor oscillations in any one commodity a general change in the level of prices can be explained only by a cause which attaches equally to all prices. Now, price in general is value expressed in terms of money; hence a general change in the price level means a change in the value of money. But the value of money, like the value of everything else, depends upon the relation of the supply of money to the demand of money. From the point of view of supply the answer is easy. The standard of the civilized world is now, and has been for some time, gold. * * * Gold, in other words, is being turned out in such enormous quantities that it is falling in value. But a fall in the value of gold, other things being equal, is tantamount to a rise in general prices.

The observations of Prof. Seligman were made prior to the war and had reference to the rather continuous rise in prices which had been going on for many years, and which Prof. Seligman attributed to the increased gold supply, which then constituted the basis of world circulation. Since the war gold has ceased to be the basis of the circulating medium and paper currency has flooded the world. When I say that I mean to limit my statement to countries other than the United States. There has even been an enormous circulation increase in our own country, due, first, to the influx of gold, and, second, to the increase in Federal reserve bank currency. All that has been greatly accentuated by increased circulation of notes and bills of exchange. An index to the volume of the latter is obtained from the increased bank deposits of the United States. The following table shows the increase in the United States:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, August 4, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your request of August 2, I have the honor to hand you herewith statement showing the per capita circulation in the United States at the close of each calendar year, 1913 to 1918, inclusive, and for July 1, 1919.

Complete circulation figures for the European countries are not available, but inasmuch as their present circulation is made up exclusively of paper notes issued either by the Government direct, such as the British currency notes, or by the central banks of issue, as in the case of the continental countries, no appreciable error will be made if changes in the per capita circulation are calculated on the basis of paper currency circulation only. Neither are there available recent official estimates of the changes in population of the European countries. Per capita circulation figures for these countries have therefore been calculated on the basis of population figures as shown by the latest censuses of 1910–11 taken in these countries.

Very truly, yours,

W. T. CHAPMAN,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Stock of money and money in circulation in the United States on Jan. 1 of each year, 1914 to 1919, and on July 1, 1919.

[In thousands of dollars.]

	Stock of money in the United States.	Money in circulation as shown by Treasurer's circulation statement.	Per capita circulation.	Money outside U. S. Treasury and Federal Reserve System.	Amount per capita outside the U. S. Treasury and the Federal Reserve System.
Jan. 1, 1914	$3,775,464	$3,477,368	$35.12
Jan. 1, 1915	3,972,374	3,545,166	35.50
Jan. 1, 1916	4,401,988	3,909,184	38.48
Jan. 1, 1917	5,012,046	4,440,933	43.00
Jan. 1, 1918	6,256,198	5,120,425	48.76	$4,255,585	$40.53
Jan. 1, 1919	7,780,794	5,951,368	55.76	5,105,140	47.83
July 1, 1919	7,588,474	5,841,027	54.28	4,842,345	45.09

Percentage increase, 54 plus.

Mr. President, I only pause to call attention to the fact that our per capita circulation on June 1, 1917, was $34.12 and that it is now $54.28. That increase alone will account to a very large extent for increased prices.

But how has it been in Europe? I will print in the RECORD a table, marked "Table E," to show the increases in Europe. I only pause long enought to call attention to the fact—and to the letter which I have from the Federal Reserve Board in explanation—that in 1913 in the United Kingdom there was in circulation of paper currency only $3.18 per capita, while there is now $45.50 per capita. In France in 1913 there was $27.85 per capita of paper currency; there is to-day $170.62 per capita of paper currency. In Germany there was in 1913, $9.50 per capita of paper currency; there is now $151.17 per capita. In Italy in 1913 there was $12.72 per capita and in 1918 $64.62. I have not been able to secure later figures from Italy.

I ask leave to insert in my remarks at this point the table to which I have just referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Paper currency in circulation at the end of each calendar year, 1913 to 1918, and on latest available date in 1919.

End of—	United Kingdom.		France.		Germany.		Italy.
	Paper currency in circulation.[1]		Paper currency in circulation.[2]		Paper currency in circulation.[3]		Paper currency in circulation.[4]
	Amount (thousands of dollars).	Per capita.	Amount (thousands of dollars).	Per capita.	Amount (thousands of dollars).	Per capita.	Amount (thousands of dollars).	Per capita.
1913	$144,000	$3.18	$1,103,000	$27.85	$617,000	$9.50	$441,000	$1.72
1914	363,000	8.03	1,927,000	48.66	1,201,000	18.50	567,000	16.35
1915	674,000	14.90	2,569,000	64.87	1,646,000	25.35	766,000	22.09
1916	924,000	20.43	3,219,000	81.28	2,601,000	40.06	968,000	27.91
1917	1,259,000	27.84	4,311,000	108.86	4,206,000	64.78	1,567,000	45.18
1918	1,917,000	42.38	5,838,000	147.42	7,691,000	118.46	2,241,000	64.62
July, 1919	2,058,000	45.50	6,757,000	170.62	9,815,000	151.17

Per capita circulation based on the following population figures of the 1910-11 censuses:

United Kingdom	45,222,000
France	39,602,000
Germany	64,926,000
Italy	34,671,000

[1] Bank of England notes and currency notes.
[2] Notes of the Bank of France.
[3] German Reichsbank notes and loan bank notes (Darlehnskassenscheine).
[4] Notes of the Banks of Italy, Naples, and Sicily. In addition there were in circulation 401.4 million dollars of treasury notes secured by 21.8 millions of metallic reserve, Nov. 30, 1918.

Mr. REED. Those astounding figures, showing the vast increase of the circulating medium of the world, simply mean that there is an enormous amount of money with which to purchase, and that money, therefore, necessarily has a smaller purchasing power. In other words, we are confronted to-day with the problem of the cheap dollar quite as much as we are with the problem of high prices, for the high prices are largely attributable to the depreciation of the dollar.

On top of this, applying Prof. Fisher's law, we must take into consideration the circulation of what may be termed substitute money, checks, and drafts. I here append tables showing increased bank deposits and credits.

INCREASED BANK DEPOSITS.

Total individual deposits in all the banks of the United States as of June for the years indicated.

Year.	Deposits (in millions).	Per cent increase over previous year.
1913	$17,475
1914	18,517	5.96
1915	19,135	3.34
1916	22,714	19.01
1917	26,289	15.43
1918	27,808	[1] 5.78
1919 [2]

[1] This decline may be explained by the various patriotic and financial levies of the year—wherein consider the Liberty loan, Red Cross, et al.

INCREASE IN BANK CREDITS.

Total credits due all banks in the United States as of June 30 for the indicated years.

1913	$14,626,700,000.00
1914	15,288,357,283.98
1915	15,788,815,177.20
1916	17,903,888,164.40
1917	20,594,228,000.00
1918	22,514,602,064.81

1919 (returns from call of June 30 not yet received).

Adapted from the summary of the combined returns from national and other banks from Reports of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918.

The amount of that no man, I presume, can estimate, but an index to it is given by the amount of bank deposits. Bank deposits in this country have increased from 1913, when they were $17,000,000,000, to $27,000,000,000 in 1918. The returns are not in yet for 1919, but undoubtedly a further large increase is shown.

Mr. President, those figures largely answer the cry that has been made as to the cause of high prices. The two great interfering causes with normal prices—the lack of supply and the increase in the volume of money—I have presented as well as I am able. I believe that these are the fundamental causes. I do not for a moment deny that human cupidity has played its part; that upon a rising market there is always more or less of speculation; and I am in thorough and absolute accord with every sensible effort that may be made to control the cupidity and rapacity of man. But, Mr. President, there is a great danger which confronts us if we do not proceed with moderation, with care, and with foresight, and that is that in the attempt to control some wicked men who may be speculating we shall alarm all business.

I say with very great frankness that it seems to me what we need to-day is more busy hands, more whirring wheels, more of industry, more of production; and I say that I do not believe you can promote investments of capital and development of business by serving notice upon every man who has a dollar to invest that the moment he invests it he must come under Government control. We may talk about how we would like to have things, but you can not ignore the plain facts of life. A man with a fortune of a million dollars to invest to-day in a business may be quite willing, in order to secure the profits that he believes he can harvest, to take the chances of loss if he is allowed to run his own business, subject, of course, to the great general laws which punish a man or punish a corporation for undertaking to create monopolies or to corner industries or otherwise violate the law. But if you serve notice upon every man who contemplates investing money in this country that if he invests his money the next day he may be compelled to take out a license to do business and that the license management or control can then direct him as to the method of running the business, regulate his profits, and fix his prices, it is my opinion that the passage of a law of that kind will stop investment and stop development.

You can very properly pass laws—and we very properly did pass laws—that would punish the proprietor of a business who sought to use his power in such a manner as to close the markets of a free people, and the statute books, not only of the Nation but of the States, bristle with laws of that kind. No man engaged in business has any right to violate those laws or to want to violate them. That sort of act is not legitimate business. But when it is proposed to say to the business of this country, in the very period when we need expansion and we need production, that "before you can engage in business you must take out a license and put yourself under the control of some Government agent," I believe that the business men and manufacturers of this country will hesitate a long time before they will invest their money in enterprises.

It is against mistakes of that kind that I am appealing to the Senate, perhaps without any effect, but with the honest purpose of trying to bring ourselves back to the thought which I expressed here in 1917 that great fundamental laws can not be set aside and that the evils of to-day are largely evils growing out of the war, from which we must for a while suffer. I believe, sir, that if we will sit steady in the boat, if we will encourage factories to produce and farmers to raise crops, if we will get the business of the country back into the hands of the men who created the business and who know how to run it, we will by this means stimulate production in our country, and after a short time we will find that the gap between production and consumption is being filled. It can not be done in a day. We clamored to get our boys back from the front, and the great majority of them are here now, but it takes time for them to get located in business and to get back to production, and it takes time for that production to reach the markets. Great benefit will come from this in a few months' time. Still, we are going to have an era of high prices until the circulation of the world gets back to normal, and we will have an era of high prices until production has caught up with consumption.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2775, to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain. I wish to announce to the Senate that I have no desire to continue the consideration of the bill to-day, but simply to make it the unfinished business, and I shall then ask to lay it aside for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2775.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands without amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, about two hours ago, while he was still speaking and that much before he finished, I thought I wanted to say a few words in answer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], or, rather, not so much in answer to him as in parallel of line with the argument he was making. I think I would have given up the hope after the long delay of his speech but for the fact of a little loss of temper upon his part and a remark which he made to the effect that I "strolled into the Chamber two or three times a day and asked somebody a question." I hope the Senator will regard it as no discourtesy for me to say that while there may be a modicum of truth in that, it is not quite as bad as strolling into the Chamber about twice a month, as he does, and then making a two-hour speech, and then leaving, as to-day—about nine Senators listening—going on back "to the great arena of the United States" to carry on his crusade against the world's peace—a rather expensive crusade, I imagine.

I do not mean that to be in the slightest degree discourteous. It is merely tit for tat, the Senator will understand, and carries with it not merely a modicum of truth, as what he said did, but the whole truth. Nothing was more uncalled for than what the Senator said about that, and I hope he will think so himself after a bit.

Mr. President, there is nothing single, there is nothing simple, but everything is complex in great world affairs and in great economic questions. The man who goes out to find a panacea for a world trouble is a man who does not know anything about what he is trying to do. It certainly required no great, labored argument to establish what the Senator calls the Fisher law, which is not Prof. Fisher's law, but God's law, to the effect that the more dollars there are in the world, other things remaining the same, the less value dollars have and the more dollars it takes to purchase a unit of the other things. It required no labored argument for that, not even the half or three-quarters of an hour the Senator spent on it, and nobody will deny that that is one of the reasons of the present high price of products, price being defined to be the value of the product as measured in dollars, although the real value of the commodity as measured in other commodities may not have increased at all. The Senator spent some time to-day and some time once before in useless talk to establish that. Everybody acknowledges that that is not only true, but a truism.

Mr. President, there are frills and embroideries in the present situation, but the fundamental consideration is this: You can not waste five years of mankind's life or of a great part of mankind's life; you can not waste men themselves, and raw material, and finished products without increasing the price of raw materials and of finished products and of human labor all over the world. That is the fundamental trouble with the present situation, because that goes to the real value of things. One of the fundamental troubles with prices is the increase in the number of dollars, and that does not go to the real value of commodities as measured against one another in the market. But when you decreased the number of men and wasted raw material and wasted finished products you increased the scarcity of things themselves—real value—and you increase the difficulty of getting them, whether with the same number of dollars that you had before or with more dollars. Of course, the number of depreciated dollars was more increased than the real number of commodity values.

Going to the very fundamentals of it all, there is no way of getting back permanently and fundamentally to normal conditions except by replacing the labor killed, crippled, or lost either with men or machinery, and replacing the lost or wasted raw material by new production, and replacing the lost or wasted finished products by new manufactures. It does not require any labored argument to establish all that to any man who has ever grown up to be grown and who has thought a little bit about values and about economics, though we have just listened to one.

But, Mr. President, there are some "frills and embroideries," as I have said, and they have something to do with the matter—temporarily at any rate. One of them is the speculator who is forestalling the market and keeping products off the market by keeping those products in cold storage. He does not amount to so much in comparison with the increase of prices by the increase of money or with the increase of values by the production of scarcity, but he amounts to a great deal to the woman who goes to market in the morning.

I could not pay a higher tribute to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] than to say that some little time before he sat down—about an hour before—while he was treating of the prices of products, I was almost convinced that my living and marketing and clothes, the sweetening for my coffee, the bacon for my breakfast, beefsteak, if I were rich enough to buy it, for my dinner—I have not bought any for a month—I could not pay any higher tribute to him than to say that I almost felt convinced by his plausibilities that I was mistaken about all that and that those things had not increased in price to me at all.

Then the Senator undertakes to tell us another reason for it. He tells us we have sold an immense amount of goods to Europe. Well, we have—much to our benefit, much to Europe's benefit—but we have sold our surplus; and the fact that it was a surplus was proven by the concession which the Senator himself made, that the value and volume of products to-day in the warehouses and in cold storage is greater than it was a year ago.

Of course we sold our surplus to Europe. We needed to sell it. Europe needed to buy it. It was a blessing to all humanity that we had it, and that they had the money to pay for it. It would have been a blessing to all humanity even if we had had to go short a little bit in order to do it. This world is no more divided into separate nationalities when it comes to eating and wearing clothes than my family and the family of any other Senator here constitute separate entities in the city of Washington when we go to market to buy bread, sausage, or cabbage. This world passed the stage long ago where restricted markets here or there spells prosperity or calamity for me or for you. It has gone to the point where world conditions regulate the value, abundance, or scarcity of things in all civilized countries. They may have very little effect in parts of Persia, and very little effect in parts of Manchuria, but in America, in Great Britain, in France and Italy, they have their inevitable and unavoidable effect.

I wanted to say these few words now not so much in answer as equal argument with what the Senator has said. I agree with him perfectly about the fact that we must not lose our equipoise, that we must not begin to imagine that we can find panaceas for these troubles. There are just these cures, and these only, to replace the man power by machinery where it can not be replaced with men; to reproduce in agriculture the lost raw material—and it takes time for both things, a longer time for the first than for the second—and to renewed production of finished products in the manufactories of the world. Until that all comes about, and especially the reproduction in agriculture, you can not have the status that there was before the war, and you never will have quite those conditions any more, for that status will never be completely reproduced, because in addition to the fact that a man lives by bread and by wearing clothes and by working in factories and on farms, he also lives psychologically, and an immense change has taken place in the mental aspect of the average man toward society and industry themselves.

Mr. President, I shall vote for everything that comes before the Senate that is not mad and that is not unwise that puts some termination to the period during which these speculators can store up products, keeping them out of American consumption, hoping for 20 or 30 per cent rise abroad, or keeping them out of American consumption hoping for 20 or 30 per cent rise here. Of course I expect violent opposition to that from Chicago and Kansas City and their spokesmen and representatives.

I shall vote for anything that is reasonable and not mad which will punish profiteers, men guilty of such unconscionable bargains that it amounts to theft in substance. But I shall not forget that while it is going on the things that must save us in the long run, which taken together constitute common sense as opposed to plutocracy on the one side and Bolshevism on the other, are work, thrift, and saving. I saw the other day a story about a woman complaining to somebody on the car that she had had to pay 15 cents for an apple, and the old man to whom she was talking said, "Well, why didn't you let the apple alone?" If anybody is fool enough to pay 15 cents for an apple, apples will stay at 15 cents and finally go up to 20 or 25 cents.

There are a whole lot of things you can do without. I went to buy a pair of shoes the beginning of this summer and they wanted $9, or whatever the price was—away up yonder. I said no, I will wear my last summer's shoes, and I am wearing them, and if the prices bother me much I will wear them next year.

You can not, if you will thrive, get away from the old plain common-sense virtues of economy and thrift. You may have all the demagogues, and you may have all the panacea preachers, you may have all the so-called economic teachers, and everybody else talk to you forever, but you have got to come back to Benjamin Franklin's philosophy, and the whole American people have got to do it. That means that the man who would be prosperous must manage his affairs if he can so that he will have a dime over at the end of the week or month and not be a dime in debt.

Somebody suggested the other day in one of the papers that H. C. L., indicating high cost of living, ought to have another H put to it—high cost of high living. I see people every day on street cars and everywhere else who are dressed in extravagant clothes, who are smoking extravagant cigars, who during the war made a sacrifice, ate less sugar and less bread, who did without flour bread in order to help the world, who are now paying any price that anybody asks them for anything. Just quit it. You can not go barefooted, of course, but if the worst comes to the worst, wear brogans. Take the profit out of profiteering by the old-fashioned simple plan of being an honored, honest man, and the honored and honest man does not live beyond his means if he can help it.

There are many things that can be done. The President has suggested some of them. There are more that can be suggested. But after you have gotten rid of all the frills and all the embroideries of the cloth, you have to get to the cloth itself after a while; and, in order to get to that, you have to reproduce; and, in order to reproduce, you have to work; and you have got to pay, and, in order to pay, you have got to save. I think sometimes about how foolish we were after the war had virtually ended. When the war had been going on four or five months and we were trying to save wheat-flour bread, I just said to myself, "When I was a boy, when the Confederacy was on its feet, I lived for two years without flour, and I can do it now"; and during the balance of the war I never ate a piece of wheat bread, and a whole lot of people cut themselves down to "wheatless days" and "sugarless days" and various other things. We got so we put two lumps of sugar in our coffee when we used to have three before. I used to think I could not drink a cup of coffee without three lumps of sugar in it, but I got so I really rather liked it better with only two lumps. I went through the whole war in that way. Why did I not continue it until now? Turned fool; "got rich" on the anticipation of peace and tried, like the balance of the great mass of the American people, to "keep up with Lizzie."

The Senator says we used just as much sugar during the war as we had used before. I know that Yazoo County, Miss., did not use as much, and I do not believe any other part of the world did, partially because they could not get it and partially because we were performing the sacred duty of self-sacrifice in order to overcome barbarism in the world by winning the war.

Now, I will go to an altogether different subject.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. President, some of you know who Frederick Palmer is. He was a war correspondent during the Japanese-Russian War and he has been a war correspondent during this war. He has written the most sensible, well-reasoned, and, in certain parts of it, the most brilliant defense of the league of nations that I have read. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read it. I want to insert it in the RECORD with a special request to the readers of the RECORD that, notwithstanding the fine print in which it may be printed, they will read it, because it will pay them to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"FREDERICK PALMER SAYS THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS CONCERNS THE WHOLE STRUCTURE OF WORLD CIVILIZATION.

[By Frederick Palmer.]

["Frederick Palmer, perhaps the most widely known of American war correspondents, has had perhaps a larger experience of conflicts than any other man living. He covered the Greco-Turkish war of 1896, the Philippine campaign, the Boxer uprising, the Russo-Japanese war, various uprisings in Central America, and the first and second Balkan wars. In the first year of the Great War he was the accredited correspondent with the British Army representing the press of the United States. Soon after we entered the war Gen. Pershing appointed Palmer chief censor on the general headquarters staff, with the title of major. He is the author of a number of books. His 'America in France' is a fine story of the work and services of our Army in the great conflict.]

"We are making the league of nations a partisan question when it is no more partisan than fresh air for school children or laboratory experiments to find a cure for tuberculosis or snake bites. It no more revolves around a single statesman's personality than the president of a railway is indispensable to the daily schedule of trains. Woodrow Wilson is one man, and 10,000,000 men have died in battle on the Continent of Europe. He is 60 years old, with perhaps 20 years of life before him. The league of nations concerns the life and livelihood of billions of human beings for generations to come and the whole structure of world civilization.

"I have voted the Republican ticket, and I may connect the responsibility of the Democratic administration with the management of the post office, but I refuse to rely exclusively on this administration or on any political party, grooming for the campaign of 1920, for the future welfare of American humanity or humanity in general.

"We are told that the World War was inevitable. If so, it was the product of the old system. Do we want to continue the old system in order to make another world war inevitable? Or are we going to try a new system? Many observers in Europe hold that if the new system—the league of nations—had been in existence in 1914 we should have avoided the cataclysm which has immersed the wreckage of nations in the blood of their sons. This supposition of itself calls to the imagination of every progressive human being.

"The soldiers who fought in Europe were fighting to preserve their children from another such war, as I have heard them say again and again. That was their sense of self-preservation, the preservation of humanity from a repetition of the late orgy of human slaughter. The cry of the allied cause was not loot, as in the old days, but to end war. All allied propaganda in this modern antitoxin age found that it must avoid any reference to the glory and adventure of war, which once had its appeal to that human nature which the cynics say can not be changed. Shall we be true in action to the thought which was the inspiration of the allied cause, now that the cause has won?

"Now, in these days, when dirigibles and planes are crossing the Atlantic and drawing the nations still closer together, the statesmen and generals who foregathered to make a treaty of peace under the direct mandate of modern sanitary democracy did not follow in the reactionary steps of the Holy Alliance. Instead of restoring fallen kings to thrones they devised a covenant of a league of nations which looks forward to a universal era of counsel and democracy in which each nation shall be made secure in self-government in its own land. Are we to invoke the Monroe doctrine against the very principle which it was meant to defend?

"The purpose of the league of nations is to try to stop war. To try to stop war! Are we against trying? Those who say that The Hague conference and other methods devised in the past have failed only open the way for argument against their contention. Diplomacy has not stopped all wars, but it has stopped many wars. The Hague conference was not a failure any more than any other effort, including any book or play or talk or legal disquisition or newspaper editorial, which had for its object the teaching of peace or the devising of means to insure it. Within recent times the Venezuelan dispute, the Agadir incident, the Japanese school question, the Canadian frontier dispute, the Persian question, the firing of the Russian fleet on British trawlers—all were incidents which in the old days might have put the match to powder.

"There were two great influences which I observed at the Paris peace conference. One was the passions of the old human nature, which cynics say can never be improved—and, therefore, if their advice were followed, would not be improved—with its racial hates, its suspicions, its predatory desire for annexations, and its spirit of revenge seeking retributory punishment for a beaten foe. The other sought to counteract and minimize all these influences which would breed future wars and to draw the nations of the world together in an agreement that would be worthy of the dreams of a lasting peace of the men who had given their lives to end war.

"In the complex and bubbling play of forces, whether narrow and medieval or farseeing, which required long discussion and compromise, the United States, with no territorial objects to gain, had an arbitral, pacific, and mighty part. The league of nations had to become an inseparable part of the treaty. As Mr. Wickersham soon found when he went abroad in a critical mood, this could not be otherwise in the practical working out of negotiations, as everyone else who has followed the peace conference knows. Though the covenant is far from the desires of extreme pacifists, who forget how arduous progress must be, it is the most forward practical step in international peace ever taken.

"The old objects of conquest and the old grounds of suspicion are largely removed. The German and Austrian Empires, formed according to the old system by the forcible annexation of conquered peoples by armies formed around royal dynasties, are resolved into as many States as there are races or people with language or practical interests in common dwelling within recognized territorial areas. Intolerable as is the Shantung provision, we must rejoice that far less than ever before, where the mixture of races leaves the location of boundaries in doubt, is the decision to be by barter of human beings at a council table. The doctrine of self-determination is invoked in the place of intrigue and bloodshed. While the citizens are not to decide as to their future nationality in all the disputed areas, the method is to be applied in five of the cases. How far public opinion may progress is shown by the declaration of thrifty, wise, and happy little Denmark, that she does not wish to annex a part of Schleswig, which is peopled by Germans.

"This is a wondrous thing—a thing to make Louis XIV, King George III, and Frederick the Great turn in their graves, while William Hohenzollern saws wood at Amerongen. Indeed, it shows that if human nature has not changed, its method of expression has changed. A hundred years is not a long time in the history of this old planet, but it is only a century and a half since George III on his throne stood for taxation without representation, and Frederick the Great on his made wars of annexation the business of Prussia.

"Carrying a step further the common law, which does not permit a man to overrun his neighbor's property, and a step further the Constitution of the United States, which does not permit the big State of Pennsylvania to overrun the little State of Delaware, the league of nations will not permit one of the stronger old nations to overrun one of the small young nations, to which the covenant and the treaty gave birth. It is more than a step—a stride—of a significance we hardly realize, so accustomed have we become to sensational events within the last five years.

"Is the Nation which freed Cuba and set her on her feet, which returned the Boxer indemnity to China, which brought popular education and sanitation to Porto Rico and the Philippines, which has sent its missionaries and teachers to distant lands, to repudiate the covenant, a covenant so eminently in keeping with its traditions and ideals?

"But may we not be required to police Armenia or Esthonia? Does not the league mean that we shall be drawn into another European war? The old system, not the new, prevailed when we were drawn in in 1917. The object of the new system is to avoid the repetition of this event. The world has grown smaller, the relations of its nations are commercially and socially more intimate and interdependent than those of our States a hundred years ago. Any great war must now be our concern. No more than in face of our pioneer movement westward the Mississippi Valley could escape inclusion in our Nation can we now escape inclusion in the world State.

"I am not one of those who pretend that I know what Lincoln would say about the league of nations if he were on earth to-day. His 'with malice toward none and with charity for all,' and every line of his Gettysburg speech breathe anything but adherence to the old system. Nor do I know what Washington would say, though, of course, many Senators do. His warning against entangling alliances was spoken while we had 3,000,000 Colonists, when the nations of Europe, each stronger than we were, were engaged in a struggle for a mastery which would leave the victors prepared to punish any outside interference. Washington's object of the moment was our security. That is precisely the object of the league of nations to-day.

"If for no other reason, I am for it in the interest of my pocketbook. Every American should be for it if he wishes to prosper. We have become the great creditor Nation of the world. Instead of borrowing from Europe, we are using the interest money which Europe with its developed resources used to receive, to develop our own unlimited resources. There is nothing for us to gain and all to lose in war. Any system which secures us in our possessions without extra expense for armament is good business for us. As a Nation we have not forgotten to remind the other nations that we stand for peace and good will and for all the principles that will give people the free enjoyment of self-rule. Shall we, who have preached loudly, show little faith in practice? For us to stand out from the only league of nations now to be had is to say to Europe that we are strong enough to go alone. It is striking an attitude of defiance. It is making us a partisan of the old system. Such action will confirm all the defenders of the old system in Europe in their espousal of force as the guiding factor of nations and will discredit all the elements that are working for progress.

"The advocates of the old system, given the opportunity, will be prompt to excite fresh enmities and new selfish alliances among the nations. Do not forget that Prussia and France once had an alliance. Italy was the ally of Germany before this war began. France and Great Britain were at swords' points over Fashoda only 20 years ago. It is only a short time since the pens of British jingoes—later to acclaim the Czar's victories over the Germans as blows for freedom—were spilling their bile over that monstrous autocracy threatening India, Persia, and Constantinople. Political combinations will change rapidly in Europe if we revert to the old system. Europe is hungry and poor, with opinions singularly subject to the emotions which are the legacy of the war. Nations thinking of their dead and seeing us rich from war with losses slight will hardly favor the new system when we turn against it.

"Do we want to excite the predatoriness of all the world against us when we have a land capable of supporting five times our population? This is not an idle question, as anyone who has recently been in Europe well knows. It is a burning question which we must answer now in face of future results. If we are to say, 'Yes, after all we are for the system,' then we must stint our appropriations for roads, schools, and public health and better conditions for our workers, increase our taxes, immediately establish universal service, and build vast fleets for the protection of our exposed coasts against assaults.

"As for American mandatories for Armenia—does that really sound sensible? Once Europe's equilibrium is restored, does any one think that European pride would welcome American soldiers policing a region which naturally belongs in the domain of European interests? This talk of our having to police Europe under the league of nations is a catch phrase, developed from the sniping on the side lines at the peace conference by army staffs and propagandists of selfish national interests under the influence of the old system in order to win American adherence to certain European annexations.

"Our mandatories will be on our own continent. This stands to reason, and we must leave something to reason and good will or we can never carry out the league of nations. Mexico is in turmoil. Hitherto any suggestion that we put her on her feet has met with the outcry from the great progressive nations of South America that our action was the opening wedge for the conquest of the continent. Under the league of nations any measures that we may take for the betterment of conditions in any backward American State which needs a helping hand to start it on the right path will be under the guaranty of the supreme court of the United States of the world. Our good faith will be vouched for by our fellow nations. The diplomatic intrigues between European and Latin-American nations which each has considered necessary to protect its own interests under the old system will cease to exist, because they will be as superfluous as preparing dugouts against bombardments from Mars. Our intervention will be in the same category as relief measures for a disaster by flood or fire within our own territorial domain.

"Undoubtedly there are flaws in the league. The Shantung provision is odious. I have read and reread article 10 without seeing in it the danger which others have found. If reservations must be made, then make them without weakening the great principle which is the guiding force of the league.

"But why should not the Senate divide on the issue itself rather than as Republicans and Democrats? Some Republicans who think that they have foresight are asking why the Republican leaders in the Senate should allow Woodrow Wilson to make the league his political property. If William Smith, Republican, had been President when the world demanded a league, would the Democrats have been against it? No doubt.

"Political partisanship has been destroying our perspective. In 1916 I heard a Republican Senator say: 'A spineless President is keeping us out of the war. We ought to be in France, fighting for France with our last man and dollar.' Now he is not only against the league of nations, but particularly bitter at the thought of entering into an agreement to protect France from German aggression. It was in 1916, too, that I heard a Democratic Senator say: 'I am for keeping out to the end. We've no business over there. We'll attend to our business and let them attend to theirs. Let them go on murdering one another until they are ready to stop.' He is now a leading supporter of the league, which his Republican colleague, just quoted, says will draw us into entangling alliances. Again, in 1916 I heard another Republican Senator, now most vigorously opposed to the league, say: 'Keep down our Army! Don't excite suspicion by preparing for war. It's time for the thinking men of the world to get together to prevent such a war as this happening again.' His present attitude should warrant him in subscribing to the view of an able Army officer, who said: 'There can be no Utopia. Men will always fight. We'll make the strongest army and navy in the world—so strong that we can stand against the world and prevent another world war by the very threat of our power.' The officer spoke in professional zeal in behalf of the old system, in which he honestly believes. It is not criticizing his profession to say that I should like to see the world able to get on with fewer Army officers. We should all like to see the world with less disease, which would enable it to get on with fewer doctors.

"The officers stated the issue. It is between war and peace. If we are against the league, then let us arm. We can not be the kind of partner in the league who suspects all his other partners of trying to take advantage of him. If we are for the league, then we can not expect the first draft to be perfect. To start making reservations is to undermine world confidence in the league. We must rely on human nature, as we do in our relations with our neighbors, to meet fair play in kind. Build a wall of suspicion between two partners in any business concern and the business will not flourish. Build one between two nations and either will soon imagine that something inimical to its interests is proceeding on the other side of the wall. This leads to armaments and eventually to war. Break a highway of mutual good feeling through the wall and the two will trade and prosper, each retaining its own customs and habits.

"The league is a framework on which to build. It sets the world to thinking of peace and planning how to maintain peace, rather than thinking of war and planning war. It may not prevent the laying of mines, but it is at least a mine sweeper. It will be as strong as the faith of public opinion in its ability chooses to make it. Whoever has seen the ruins in France and the streams of wounded from the fields of battle and the dead lying on the field feels too deeply about the most ambitious and practical effort to stop war that has ever been devised not to speak his word in its favor. I believe in the league because I believe in the human race and human progress."

STRIKES AND LABOR CONDITIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, apropos of the discussion of this afternoon I want to refer for a brief moment to a statement appearing in the New York Sun of this date. It is entitled:

Gravediggers quit—demand more pay—forty at Mount Olivet Cemetery strike for 50 cents increase a day.

The article proceeds:

Another strike of gravediggers was reported yesterday from Mount Olivet Cemetery in the Maspeth section of Newtown, Queen's, when 40 men, most of them foreigners living in the district, laid down their shovels and walked out of the graveyard because cemetery officials refused to increase their wages from $4 to $4.50 a day. They then picketed the entrances and tried to prevent other men from entering, but Superintendent Chamberlain managed to find some more men to dig the graves. Cemetery officials said that by working night and day with the emergency force they would be able to keep up with the burials as not many people are dying now.

That seems providential under the circumstances.

The article proceeds with a reference to a Manhattan strike of painters for a 44-hour week; with a strike of 500 gasfitters, helpers, jobbers, and drivers employed in the meter department of the Brooklyn Gas Co.; and of 48 men in the repair department of the Flatbush Gas Co.; and at the end of the column I find a telegram from Pittsburgh announcing that "the motormen and conductors of the Pittsburgh Railway Co., in session here to-day and to-night, voted almost unanimously to go on strike at midnight."

Yesterday morning's papers informed us that a committee of physicians had been appointed in New York to consult with the organizers of the American Federation of Labor with a view of forming a doctors' union to affiliate with that organization, doubtless for the purpose of improving the condition of the physicians of that city and incidentally in agreeing upon a generous scale of compensation for professional services. All the actors of the city of New York are out on strike, and they are indulging in the same methods which are characteristic of strikes by humbler workers of the world.

Mr. President, it would seem from these statements, which are but a few of many of similar character, that the world has caught the contagion of a strike disease and is responding to it with a unanimity that suggests that the Government is becoming one of the strikers, for the strikers, and by the strikers.

Every combination which suspends its activities, whatever the alleged grievance, only contributes to the general unrest and to the pressure upon production. It is a melancholy spectacle to contemplate that in this country there are more of these occurrences than ever known in its economic history; and yet there is more money in circulation, wages are higher, there are more evidences of luxury and extravagance; there is a better trade in comforts, such as jewelry, automobiles, and expensive apparel; the theaters are patronized as never before; and instead of a general condition of suffering and starvation there is a general condition of prosperity, punctuated here and there by suffering consequent upon the stationary character of compensation to some as compared with the constant rise of prices of the necessities of life.

I of course know that calling attention to this situation may not improve it. At the same time we must recognize that it can not go on forever, and that if continued during the summer months in the same proportions which now prevail real suffering will be acute when winter comes on, because of the decreased production and a decreased supply of things that are necessary to carry us through the cold and inclement season.

The Bolshevist declares—and in that expression I include the I. W. W.—that the rise in the demand for higher wages must be continued until they shall absorb all the fruits of production and by that means compel a transfer of all property to them through universal bankruptcy. I am not contending that these occurrences are actuated by any such motive, although I am inclined to suspect that some of them are. But whatever the motive, the conclusion is obvious, for just so soon as demands upon production reach a point where everything which induces man to produce is absorbed by the demands made upon it, just so soon will production cease.

On the other hand, if everybody is to be subject to this infection, take it everywhere and get it behind us. We might set the example here and bring matters to a climax. Everybody else is striking; why not the Congress of the United States? Suppose the House and the Senate form a congressional union, differing somewhat from the late congressional union of unhappy memory, and quit legislating until we can be assured of improved conditions and better pay, and, above all, until we receive a guaranty of our reelection in the year 1920. Perhaps the Foreign Relations Committee could bring matters to a climax upon the treaty by going on a strike and force the President to accede to their demand. Perhaps they would make a report more expeditiously by that process.

That seems ridiculous. Yet policemen in this city last night were engaged in forming an association to affiliate with other associations. The policemen at Chicago formed a union some time since. The guardians of the public peace in nearly all the great cities either have done or are doing the same thing. They affiliate with larger confederations and become subject to its orders and requirements, with the result that when a sympathetic strike occurs the guardians of the people, those whose business it is to see that the laws are observed and life and property safeguarded, are faced with the alternative either of performing their obligations to the Government, which ought to be the first consideration, or of obeying the conflicting orders of that industrial organism of which they are a constituent part.

I believe, Mr. President, that official unions, whether State, municipal, or Federal, found and uniting with industrial or economic organizations carrying obligations that must conflict sooner or later with those public duties which they owe to the Government and for which they are paid, should be rigidly prohibited and the prohibition enforced.

The tendency, however, has gone so far, and the absence of any protest against it has been so notable and continued, that I suppose no suggestion of that kind will now be heeded, much less acted upon. But it is a melancholy commentary upon the social and industrial conditions of America that in these times of prosperity—for we have a genuine prosperity, although it may be artificial—so little regard is paid to the wants and requirements of the great body of American consumers. The child is deprived of its sustenance through strikes, and the bodies of the dead can not find interment while men cease to work and wrangle over demands which, if just, can so easily find satisfaction by other methods and if unjust should not be made at all.

This can not, Mr. President, go on forever. I trust that common sense will return to the masses before long, and that men and women everywhere will again perceive that obedience to law is not only the first duty of the citizen but is the surest means of accomplishing his purposes and of securing his happiness. Unless that be done, the turbulent minorities, which seem everywhere disinclined to submit to the good old democratic rule of the majority, will by their conduct only make matters worse. Conditions are approaching a crisis, which I trust will soon have been reached and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 15, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lead us by Thy grace, our Father in heaven, through this a newborn day, that with clear vision, clean hearts, and high resolves we may put on record enactments which shall exalt the people here represented.

Let the dignity which should characterize this body obtain, through the courtesy and urbanity of its Members. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On July 31, 1919:

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution to ratify and confirm, from and including July 1, 1919, obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1920.

On August 2, 1919:

H. R. 5418. An act increasing the pay of printers and pressmen employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes.

On August 4, 1919:

H. R. 2847. An act providing additional aid for the American Printing House for the Blind.

On August 6, 1919:

H. R. 6450. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1914,' as amended."

On August 7, 1919:

H. R. 5228. An act granting the consent of the Congress to the city of Minneapolis, a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 5648. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Rainy River between Spooner, Minn., and Rainy River, Province of Ontario, Canada;

H. R. 6342. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River at the town of Usk, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 6434. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River about 2 miles above its confluence with the Washita River, near Preston, Grayson County, Tex.;

H. R. 6438. An act authorizing the counties of Aiken, S. C., and Richmond, Ga., to construct a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Augusta, Ga.;

H. R. 6692. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Forsyth, Mo.; and

H. R. 6805. An act to authorize the county of Dougherty, State of Georgia, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, connecting Broad Street, in the city of Albany, said State and county, with the Isabella Road, said county and State.

On August 11, 1919:

H. R. 5032. An act to extend the franchise in the parishes and separate congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia.

On August 12, 1919:

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227).

POINT OF NO QUORUM.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. With the exception of the day that the President addressed Congress there has not been a quorum here in two weeks, and we had 18 Members here this morning to hear the prayer. I think we should have a quorum here to consider business, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that point a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to have a quorum, and I think the gentleman from Wyoming should help us get one.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to submit a suggestion before the gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The gentleman knows perfectly well——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, regular order!

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas insists that the House shall not do any business to-day——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I am not insisting on that. I should like to get a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Although I may be declared to be not in order, I wish to register a protest against this continued effort to defeat necessary business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. I move a call of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 32, noes 12.

Accordingly, under the order made yesterday, the House (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, August 18, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting copies of two letters received from the Spanish ambassador, each requesting a reduction of the prevailing duty upon the importation of tomatoes (H. Doc. No. 189), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8303) granting a pension to E. Dora Cutler and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HADLEY: A bill (H. R. 8475) authorizing the reconstruction of the buildings and the replacement of the equipment at Baker Lake (Wash.) fish hatchery of the Bureau of Fisheries; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. ESCH: Resolution (H. Res. 242) for the consideration of Senate bill 641 upon adoption of resolution; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. HUDDLESTON: Resolution (H. Res. 243) to provide for the investigation of charges made by representatives of the railroad employees of fraudulent overcapitalization and mismanagement of railroads, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,

Mr. WOODYARD introduced a bill (H. R. 8476) granting a pension to Ruth Maxwell, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Catholic Order of Foresters, St. Benedict Court, No. 782, of Peru, Ill., opposing the enactment of the Smith-Towner educational bills; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of Warren B. Thayer, of Rockford, Ill., opposing Government ownership of the railroads and the plan of a financial partnership between the roads and the employees; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, concerning the Federal Board of Vocational Education; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of the Eli Bower Post, No. 92, Department of Illinois, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the bill granting a pension of $50 per month to the surviving veterans of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of the Lithuanian Roman Catholic Alliance of America, Lodge No. 221, of La Salle, Ill., urging that the United States Government recognize the present Lithuanian Government and render it moral and material assistance; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of the Illinois State Medical Society, protesting against the provision of the Harrison narcotic law, levying a tax on physicians; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Barr Clay Co., of Streator, Ill., opposing the Nolan-Kenyon bills, to provide for a permanent United States Employment Service; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petitions of the Illinois Association of Postmasters and John H. McGrath, postmaster at Morris, Ill., for increased compensation for all postmasters and post-office employees; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of the J. D. Tower & Sons Co., of Mendota, Ill., opposing Senate joint resolution No. 57; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of the Free Sewing Machine Co., of Rockford, Ill., opposing the Nolan-Kenyon bill, for the continuation of the United States Employment Service; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. REBER: Petitions of John Rumbavage, R. F. D. No. 1, box 36, Pottsville, Pa., and T. P. Krizananskas, 137 South Main Street, Shenandoah, Pa., relative to the Republic of Lithuania; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SINCLAIR: Petition of the National Alliance of Bohemian Catholics, Lankin, N. Dak., protesting against the Smith-Towner educational bill; to the Committee on Education.

Also, a letter from A. A. Rumreich, Pisek, N. Dak., against the Smith-Towner educational bill; to the Committee on Education.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 18, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Lord of our Fathers, King of all the earth, command upon us, we beseech Thee, Thy blessing, that with eyes open to Thy wisdom we may so act this day that our Nation may be more firmly established in Thy righteousness, that our world may be blessed, that the day may be drawn nearer when Thy will shall be done on the earth as it is done in heaven. Grant this, we beseech Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial on the subject of the high cost of living.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Florida Times-Union, Jacksonville, Fla., Friday, Aug. 15, 1919.]

WORK AND SAVE—THE REMEDY.

"In a letter made public a few days ago, the writer, W. P. G. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, makes the most practical of suggestions on the subject of the proper remedy for the universally complained of high cost of living. The letter is addressed to Senator MCLEAN, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and among other commendable views gives expression to the following:

"Whether viewed from an economic or financial standpoint, the remedy for the present situation is the same, namely, to work and to save; work regularly and efficiently, in order to produce and distribute the largest possible volume of commodities and to exercise economies in order that money, goods, and services may be devoted primarily to the liquidation of debt and to the satisfaction of the demand for necessities rather than to indulge in extravagance or the gratification of a desire for luxuries.

"This is a very brief but none the less comprehensive proposition of a remedy for the ills incident to high prices. It is plain, it is practical. It is a remedy which every individual, man, woman, and child, can employ, and if generally and universally employed there is every reason to believe that there would be a very instant and exceedingly large measure of relief from the affliction of high prices.

"During the days and years of war the people responded very generally to the requests for sacrifice, for getting along with as little as possible of even the essential necessaries of life and without any of the luxuries, for the purpose of helping 'to win the war.' Those sacrifices did help. Of this there is no question. This being so in war time, why not make it so in peace time, not to the severe extent which many loyal patriots went in the matter of self-denial but to an extent that will do good to themselves and to the country?

"Denial and saving were practiced during war time for the good of others, that our soldiers might have all that they required and that fellow human beings might not be permitted to starve to death. Which was eminently right and proper—in the highest sense patriotic. Why, then, for the benefit of the individuals themselves, should there not be very much of this same habit of economy, of saving, of efficient work, speeded to the limit, in order that good may come to them? By this is not meant a degree of saving that partakes of stinginess and of unreasonable stinting, for which there is no call at this time. But there is a call, and one that is loud and strong, to all the people to make a halt in the prodigality of spending, of denying themselves luxuries that they can very well do without and saving the money that they are now paying out in this manner against the 'rainy day' which is sure to come sooner or later to the rich and poor alike, to the union man as well as to him who belongs to no labor organization.

"Wise men and women save in the days of their prosperity; those who are foolish waste. Sane, sensible men who work, either with head or hand, or combining both, work with all the efficiency that they are capable of in order that the product of their labor may be of the best possible and in maximum quantity, realizing that by efficient and productive service they are helping themselves to attain to higher places of employment and service and at the same time reap the rewards that come with efficient labor that is at the same time productive of the utmost amount that it is possible to produce in a given time.

"Of a truth, there is entirely too much of the inclination and practice to do as little as possible and to do that little with only sufficient efficiency to 'get by' to the pay desk, where workers of this class make demands for increased pay and shorter working periods. What is the result? That everybody, workers included, must pay higher prices for the necessaries of life, for the things they absolutely need. Were this not so, were efficiency of labor and volume of production speeded up and practiced more generally, it is reasonable to believe that prices would soon take a downward trend and that labor so given would command the maximum of compensation.

"What is here said is by no means meant to convey the impression that what is commonly designated as labor should be denied the privilege of getting all the compensation that efficient work is entitled to. Nor are the luxuries of life and living justifiably to be denied to those who toil. But there is a reasonable line that all men and women must draw, each for himself and herself. And as that line of reason is put into practice right now, so will come individual prosperity and advancement, and from the individual to the city, the county, the State, and the Nation."

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I should like to read to it an editorial in the New York Sun of yesterday, which, as a member of the committee to investigate Mexican affairs and a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, appeals to me with a distinct and emphatic interest. It is as follows:

[From the Sun and New York Press, Sunday, Aug. 17, 1919.]

IF MR. WILSON'S LEAGUE WAS ESTABLISHED AND WE HAD TROUBLE WITH MEXICO.

"There is one fortunate thing, and only one, about the Mexican circumstances—the wavering policy of the administration in regard to the protection of American lives and property in Mexico and the impudent attitude of Mr. Wilson's protégé Carranza. It is this: The situation affords a valuable indication of what our plight under similar conditions would be if the treaty was ratified unchanged, as the President has demanded; if the provisions of the covenant were a national obligation, if the league of nations was established and operating according to the plan which our self-appointed representative at Paris has been trying to force upon his country.

"Consider it!

"With the United States a member of the league of nations and Mexico a nonmember, trouble between the two Governments threatening war would at once become the business of the permanent secretariat, the council, and the assembly at Geneva.

"See article 11:

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"The United States could escape this alien jurisdiction only by waiting two years after giving notice of intention to withdraw, and even then not unless the judgment of the exotic supergovernment was that we had fulfilled all our international obligations in general and all our special obligations under the covenant.

"See article 1:

"Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"Will it be believed that according to the letter of this international law proposed by the President of the United States to the Senate of the United States all our relations with Mexico since 1847—or, as to that, with any other nation since the birth of time—would actually become subject, by our own consent, to scrutiny and appraisal by a foreign tribunal unknown to our Constitution? Yet such would be the case, provided the secretariat, the council, and the assembly at Geneva decided to exercise their clearly delegated powers of review. And if the foreign supergovernment acquitted us, it would nevertheless be two years before we could finally break away from the disastrous entanglement.

"A dispute between the United States and Mexico over matters involving the protection of American lives and property in Mexico would immediately and automatically result in an invitation from the league to Mexico to become a member on a parity with the United States.

"See article 17:

"In the event of a dispute between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the council may deem just.

"If Mexico should accept the invitation and become for the purposes of the dispute a member of the league the United States would be compelled by its contract under the covenant to forego its present right of dealing with the Mexican question in its own independent way and to submit its case either to arbitration or to investigation by the exotic council. Meanwhile our hands would be tied for at least three months, probably for many months, while Mexico went on murdering.

"See article 17 and article 12:

"If such invitation is accepted the provisions of articles 12 to 16, inclusive, shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the council.

"If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration [and the matter of border outrages or murders in the interior could never be submitted by the United States to foreign arbitration] the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council.

"The council may in any case under this article [article 15] refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

"So Carranza's government, merely by accepting for the purposes of this 'dispute' the obligatory invitation to become a member of the league, could shelter itself for an indefinite time from precautionary or punitive measures on our part behind the action of the assembly, in which we should have no vote and the British Empire, for example, would have six votes; and this exotic body would decide for us what we might do or might not do for the prevention of outrage along the Rio Grande or murder of Americans in the interior. And in case the decision of the supergoverning assembly was one which the United States could not in honor or in interest accept, and we should insist on a procedure not approved by the supergovernment, we should by our own showing have declared war not only against Mexico but against Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and all the other members of the league, big and little.

"See article 16:

"Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

"Further still in article 16:

"It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

"And if, undeterred by the Ernulphian curse of the covenant, the United States should persist in pursuing its rightful course of action respecting Mexico and should disentangle itself from the league either by the regular, if slow, process of withdrawal or by voluntarily and joyfully incurring the penalty of expulsion which article 16 provides, and if Mexico, for shelter for the crimes of her bandits and the irresponsibility of her Government, should remain a member when we were out, the celebrated article 10 would become operative for the benefit of the other party to the 'dispute':

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"We have taken the trouble to attempt to exhibit thus concretely and specifically the bearing upon our independence of action with regard to Mexico of the covenant which President Wilson has prepared for our shackling. It has been his pleasant fashion while demanding the ratification of the treaty as he proposes it down to the smallest iota to describe the covenant as no abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, but, on the contrary, as a beautiful extension of that doctrine. We should say so—an extension with a vengeance! Prismatic idealism indeed!

"Is there an American worthy of the name who does not prefer that our policy regarding Mexico and our dealings with Mexico in case of border or internal outrage upon American citizens or their property shall remain as now matters for our own decision and settlement, exclusive of any inteference or supervision from the other side of the Atlantic or the other side of the Pacific?

"The Sun hopes so and believes so and is confident that the Eagle is of the same mind."

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Nelson	Smoot
Ball	Gronna	New	Spencer
Bankhead	Hale	Nugent	Stanley

Elkins	La Follette	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	McCormick	Robinson	Wolcott
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard
Gay	McNary	Smith, Ga.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

RURAL CREDITS AND VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution passed by the Senate of Porto Rico, praying that the rural credits and vocational education laws be made applicable to Porto Rico, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The resolution is as follows:

I, José Muñoz Rivera, secretary of the Senate of Porto Rico, do hereby certify that the attached copy is a true and correct transcription of Senate resolution 1, entitled: Senate resolution praying the Congress of the United States to make applicable to Porto Rico the laws known as "Rural credits" and "Vocational education" acts, approved on April 1, 1919.

Senate Chamber, April 4, 1919.

[SEAL.] JOSÉ MUÑOZ RIVERA,
Secretary of the Senate.

Senate resolution praying the Congress of the United States to make applicable to Porto Rico the laws known as "Rural credits" and "Vocational education" acts.

Whereas it is the sense of the Senate of Porto Rico and of the people of Porto Rico represented by it that the application to this island of the congressional acts generally known as the "Rural credits act" and "Vocational education act," would be highly beneficial to the country in general; and

Whereas the Legislature of Porto Rico, at its first regular session, transmitted to Congress a petition identical to that herein contained and no opportunity should be given Congress even to suppose that the interest of the country to benefit by the said acts has been abandoned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico, That the Congress be, and the same is hereby, respectfully petitioned to make applicable to Porto Rico, through proper legislation, the laws generally known as the "Rural credits act" and "Vocational education act"; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be transmitted in the usual manner, and immediately upon approval thereof, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington, for their knowledge; and be it further

Resolved, That the subject matter of this resolution shall be urged in Congress and before the Federal authorities by any commission hereafter created by the legislative assembly for the purpose of urging before the said bodies and officials any matter relating to Porto Rico.

AUT R. BARKEL,
President of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial from the chairman of the American Commission on Irish Independence, pointing out the grave injustices and abuses which have grown up under the passport system, and praying for legislation to correct these abuses, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of the City Council of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Florida, praying that producers of potash in this country be required to sell in competition with potash producers from all other countries, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of the Board of Trade of Tampa and of sundry citizens of Tampa, Lakeland, Winter Haven, Avon Park, Crystal River, Belleview, and Orlando, all in the State of Florida, praying for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Miami, Fla., praying for the enactment of legislation to reduce the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. KEYES) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brookline, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of New Market, N. H., praying for the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FERNALD presented a memorial of the Union Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Aroostook, Me., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Sonoma County Building Trades Council, of Santa Rosa, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Benton, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of New Hampton, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the Holy Name Society of Swanton, Vt., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Lake Park, Frazee, Owatonna, Bemidji, Winona, Belgrade, and St. Paul, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the repeal of the so-called luxury tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of Local Union No. 1233, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Detroit, Mich., of sundry citizens of New York City, Fairmont, W. Va., Logan and Laurelville, Ohio, and Richmond, Va., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal clerks, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Saginaw, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Marquette, East Lansing, Muskegon, Central Lake, Alma, Lyons, Colon, Glen Arbor, Detroit, and Adrian, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 411, International Molders' Union, of Owosso, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called civil-service retirement bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Saginaw, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Springfield, Lawrence, Watertown, Boston, Beverly, Brookville, Grafton, Fall River, Pittsfield, and Somerset, and telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Brookline, Milton, Templeton, Winthrop, Boston, New Bedford, Sudbury, Norton, Roxbury, Lawrence, West Roxbury, and South Yarmouth, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Milford, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Rising Hope Lodge, No. 22, International Order of Good Templars, of Mattapoisett, Mass., and a petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Roxbury, and Dorchester, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enforcement of prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry Greek citizens of New York City, N. Y., Buffalo, N. Y., Waltham, Mass., Pottsville, Mass., Newark, N. J., Lagrange, Ga., and Charlotte, N. C., praying that Thrace, Macedonia, Epirus, and Dodecanese be annexed to Greece, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. During the past few weeks I have received from citizens of Massachusetts a large number of communications pro and con relative to the league of nations. I present these communications and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The petitions favoring the league substantially as it stands and those either opposing it in toto or insisting upon important reservations as a condition of acceptance I have had grouped, and I ask that the list may be printed in the RECORD under the appropriate headings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 861) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 150) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following joint resolutions, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) exempting the Dixie Highway from the prohibition contained in the act approved July 11, 1919 (Rept. No. 152); and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) to permit the payment for certain lands where requisition of the title thereto was duly served and possession taken thereunder or where a binding agreement was entered into followed by the taking possession thereof and erection of improvements thereon prior to July 11, 1919 (Rept. No. 153).

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, and I submit a report (No. 151) thereon. I wish to state that at the earliest opportunity I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAPPER introduced a bill (S. 2808) granting a pension to Brittian Capril Smith, which (with the accompanying papers) was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EDWARD SIGERFOOS.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a bill to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I may say that it is a redraft of Senate bill 2717, introduced for the same purpose by me on August 4, 1919. I have redrafted it in order to have it in harmony with a precedent which was established by the Congress of the United States, as will be seen in an act to correct the military record of John T. Haines, approved February 17, 1915. I make this statement for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2807) to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF INDUSTRIES.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I give notice that on Thursday next I shall desire to address the Senate on the Federal control of industries.

PEACE TREATY—INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, at the conclusion of the morning business and with the permission of the Senate, I shall submit a few observations upon part 13 of the peace treaty, and, in connection therewith, some observations relating to the present industrial conditions in America.

EFFECT OF TREATY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I give notice that on Wednesday next, or as soon thereafter as I may be heard, I intend to submit some remarks on the effect and efficacy of interpolative clauses in a separate but contemporaneous resolution.

INTERNATIONAL POLICY IN THE LEVANT AND THE FAR EAST.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I give notice that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the morning hour, I purpose to address the Senate on the subject of the treaty in its relation to international policy in the Levant and the Far East.

LETTER FROM EX-GOV. M'CALL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from ex-Gov. McCall, of my State, on the duties of straight Americanism.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Sun, Sunday, Aug. 17, 1919.]

A LEAGUE FOR FUTURE WAR—FORMER GOV. M'CALL ON THE DUTIES OF STRAIGHT AMERICANISM.

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: As one of those very strongly of the opinion that the time has come for a concert of the nations against war, I have felt that our acceptance of the proposed league should be conditioned upon modifications chiefly relating to the independence of the United States and its equality among the nations. The league will be under a sufficient handicap on account of the general provisions of the treaty without having America stripped of any of those vital attributes which have helped her to become the greatest pacific force the world holds to-day. One hesitates to speak in detail of what our Allies are taking from the peace. We wish them all well, but we must be filled with dismay when the nations of Europe have broken with all the traditions of their statesmanship and when an order is proposed at the price of hopelessly upsetting the equilibrium of the world. If the results of the peace shall abide, the future imperialist of some of the allied nations will fondly look back upon this period, in its acquisition of territory and permanent transfer of trade, as upon his country's golden age.

One of the great empires which for a thousand years has played a foremost part in the government of Europe has been torn limb from limb, and in its place are established new nations founded upon doubtful ethnological lines and coming into the world fighting each other. That fate is visited upon Austria which a century ago was proposed for France.

No sympathy need be wasted upon Germany. As to her, it is what Lloyd-George calls a terrible peace, but it is terrible not merely in its present aspects but for the enormous mass of hate that it will transmit to the future. To uphold such a peace and safeguard the spoils of so many empires will tax all the resources of a league of nations, which would have no light task to preserve the peace in a normal world and not have strapped upon it the burden of this new order. We must face the fact that we are in danger of having a mere league of victors rather than a world-wide league of nations, and a peace that must be propped up by the bayonets of a minority of the Caucasian and a small minority of the yellow race.

That the arrangement now proposed infringes upon the sovereignty of this Nation need not be argued. The French treaty makes more explicit the view that its foremost architects entertained of the function of the league. Under that treaty our obligation to send armies to France is to take effect at the command of the league and to terminate when, if ever, the same power shall release us from it. To delegate to an alien authority the power to decide when we shall fight and when we shall cease fighting is to surrender the very plume and crest of sovereignty.

Our Nation asks nothing; it will take nothing. But our brave soldiers did not fight to yield up to Europe and Asia that independence which was so greatly won and has been so greatly kept by their countrymen of other times. Seriously to impair that would be an appalling calamity even to the peace of the world, and it would be to break faith with the past as it has never been broken by a nation except under the most extreme compulsion.

If the time for internationalism has come evidence of it should not appear in America alone; but the other nations are as intensely national as ever. If they remain national while we become international and dissipate our energies over other lands we shall soon be only a free horse for the world to ride. Our eyes will be forever turned upon Europe, and what remains of America will do its thinking in terms of the Briton and Teuton and Gaul and degenerate into a mere intellectual province.

If the rights of America need safeguarding or the league may be improved it is the obvious duty of the Senate to propose the requisite changes. The power of negotiating treaties is confided to the President. The practice that has at times been followed of choosing Members of the Senate as his agents has been gravely condemned by the greatest Senators as an infringement upon the Senate's power judicially to review. But that power of review is as constitutional and as vital as the power of negotiation. It was never more vital than in this crisis. It now devolves upon the Senate to determine to what it can give its advice and consent as the Senate of the American people.

SAMUEL W. McCALL.

WINCHESTER, MASS., August 16.

BRITISH-CONTROLLED OIL FIELDS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I recently presented a report of Mr. Van. H. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines, in which he referred to the monopolization of the oil of the world in foreign hands. I have now an article from the Sunday Times of London of July 27, giving a report of a meeting of the Bolivar Concessions (Ltd.)—already absorbed by a new monopoly—Mr. D. Elliott Alves, chairman of the company, presiding, who in his address not only confirms all that Mr. Van. H. Manning presented to the Secretary of the Interior and through me to the Senate, concerning the control of oil, but he goes further and reveals now the existence of the "British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.)," a company designed to absorb great oil properties. His report is so illuminating that I ask that the part of it which I have marked be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"It is well that shareholders should realize what the constitution of the British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.), in which you are so largely interested, really is. This corporation has been organized in such a way as will enable it, I am advised, in due course to occupy a position in the oil world probably second to none, and a brief outline of the magnitude of its operations and its immense potential future will at this stage be of value to the shareholders in the present company. It is known to a number of shareholders of this company that vast concessions have been acquired from, and others are at the present moment being negotiated with, the Governments of a number of mid-Central American Republics and private owners. These concessions stretch from the frontier of Mexico right away to Brazil, forming an almost uninterrupted chain of concessions and properties encircling approximately two-thirds of the Caribbean Sea, with numerous ports on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The areas comprised in these great possessions already amount to over 18,000,000 acres, and will at the conclusion of satisfactory negotiations, now in progress with various republics, exceed this figure many times over. It is not to be assumed that such vast areas will all contain oil, or, even if they do, in highly commercial quantities, but it is a fact that large areas are already known to do so. The greatest care is being taken to ascertain which areas are likely to be most lucrative for the operations of the British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.), and various expeditions have been sent to mid-Central America and are at present operating and investigating there, under the leadership of some of the most eminent British oil engineers and geologists, with fully equipped staffs to assist them in arriving at these conclusions.

* * * * * * *

"And this is the position as it applies to the shareholders of this company and the shareholders of the British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.); but there is another standpoint from which the position must be viewed, and that is its importance in its relation to the British Empire. Machinery has already been created, as I had occasion to mention at a previous meeting, which places the whole of the oil supplies which may be obtained from this vast chain of territories, should they each, or, in fact, any number of them, prove of the value anticipated, absolutely under British control. A voting trust has been created, which will be permanent, and the result of which will be that, no matter who may acquire controlling share interests, however financially powerful they may be, can ever divert a single barrel of oil from national or imperial requirements. For all time, in some instances, and in others for the full life of the concessions, adequate supplies of oil, we may confidently assume, should the fields develop at the ratio we are led to believe they will, will be at the disposal of either the Imperial Government or the nation. Having in mind the supplies of oil now available for the world's consumption and the constantly expanding demand which is increasing at a ratio and will continue to so increase year by year in quantities unthought of only a comparatively few years ago, it is unquestionably evident that the future, and not so far distant future, perhaps, of the British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.) holds out great promise. It must be borne in mind, however, that such a vast field of operations, covering so many countries, although fortunately linked together, will require for its development, and I might say even a comparatively small portion of its area, a considerable period of time and an immense expenditure of money and technical knowledge. Time is at our command, also the highest technical knowledge, and we believe that all the capital that will be necessary will also be available."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 15th instant, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On August 15, 1919:

S. 2594. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark;

S. 2595. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.

RETURN OF THRACE TO GREECE.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask leave of the Senate to read part of a cable dispatch from Paris under date of August 16, and then to have inserted in the RECORD, in connection with a word I wish to say, three other dispatches of about that date.

The idea—

That is, of dealing with Thrace—

is that central Thrace shall be internationalized, and thus provide Bulgaria with an international outlet to the sea; that western Thrace shall be divided between Bulgaria and Greece, Bulgaria obtaining the northern shoulder of the region and Greece the southern portion to the sea. Eastern Thrace, with Adrianople on its border, would follow the fate of Constantinople.

The other cables deal with the seemingly unrelated question of the British treaty with Persia, which in England as well as in France, according to the cables, is considered tantamount to the establishment of a protectorate.

Almost every day brings evidence from Europe that the negotiations in Paris are following the old habit of dividing the spoils among the victors. The great powers among the victors can not agree to accord Constantinople to the State which obviously should administer it, whether under the fanciful form of a mandate or in sovereignty—Greece. They can not decide to divide Thrace between Bulgaria and Greece or award it to Greece, because they want to retain for themselves Constantinople, one of the great strategic points of the world. That is the motive which leads them to refuse to Greece what should be properly awarded to her—sovereignty over Thrace and Constantinople. Yet at the same time, apparently privy from the deliberations of the conference in Paris, Great Britain made, consummated, and ratified a treaty with Persia which establishes what is in substance a protectorate over that country. Nothing like that has happened since Disraeli, secretly from his colleagues, in that conference in the congress of Berlin, sold the support of Britain to the Turks.

The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has just introduced a report touching on the question of oil. It happens that one of the great undeveloped oil fields of the world is in Persia, and it has been whispered in London, as Senators know, that the formation of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. in 1913 was one of the causes which brought on the great conflict.

Mr. President, I have taxed the patience of the Senate by these few remarks at this time. I ask that the dispatches referred to by me be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COUNCIL PLANS TO SPLIT THRACE INTO THREE PARTS.

[By G. S. Adam, special cable from the London Times to the Washington Post. Copyright, 1919, by the Public Ledger Co.]

PARIS, August 16.

The peace conference appears to be getting nearer to a solution of the difficult question of the future of Thrace. No unanimous decision yet has been taken. Indeed, it is difficult to take any decision during the uncertainty as to America's rôle in Constantinople and the remnant of Turkey in Europe, but practically there is an agreement among the powers—with the exception of Greece, naturally—in regard to splitting up Thrace.

The idea is that central Thrace shall be internationalized and thus provide Bulgaria with an international outlet to the sea; that western Thrace shall be divided between Bulgaria and Greece, Bulgaria obtaining the northern shoulder of the region and Greece the southern portion to the sea.

Eastern Thrace, with Adrianople on its border, would follow the fate of Constantinople.

This solution has not received the approval of M. Venizelos, and the conference is now awaiting the result of certain direct representations which have been made to Mr. Wilson before it comes to a final decision.

PARIS, Friday, August 15.

Announcement that the Shah of Persia would visit Europe, with circumstances relative to his trip which have recently come to light, is causing much comment in the French political press circles, criticism predominating. The Echo de Paris says:

"Great Britan has just imposed upon Persia a veritable protectorate. It is an important step on the course which the London cabinet has been following for the past five years, and it is hoped the expansion of British influence in that region does not mean the effacement of France."

Attention is drawn to the fact that the Anglo-Persian treaty was concluded without being submitted to the league of nations.

PARIS, August 15.

The French newspapers have been stirred up by the news from Teheran that the British minister there has just obtained the signature of the Shah to an agreement by which Persia will pass exclusively under British control, the finances to be reorganized by British agents and the army to be placed under British officers. Already, according to the French papers, this action has been resented by the people, who accuse the Government of having sold their country.

It is recalled that the Persians sent a delegation to the peace conference, which, like those of the Koreans and Egyptians, were kept outside and never heard. British diplomacy in Persia appears to be proceeding regardless of the league of nations.

According to the French view Persia has been placed exactly in the position of Egypt. The Journal des Debats says it is the last act of a process which has developed with a logic that has not escaped the attention of those who have watched events outside of the conference. It adds:

"The fact that Persia has been admitted as an adherent of the league of nations can not inspire many illusions. British policy has not ceased to concentrate its forces upon Persia, forbidding it to engage counsellors, even simple foreign professors, while the peace conference tries without result to settle a policy for Europe."

LONDON, August 15.

Official announcement was made to-day that the Persian and British Governments have concluded an agreement by which Great Britain will be enabled to provide Persia with expert assistance and advice toward the rebuilding of the Persian State. The negotiations have been in progress for nine months.

The first article of the agreement pledges Great Britain to respect absolutely the territorial integrity and independence of Persia.

Persia by the terms of the agreement will establish a uniformed force, in which will be incorporated the various existing armed bodies. This force will be put under the instruction of British officers. Great Britain will advance Persia $10,000,000 to enable Persia to initiate certain contemplated reforms with the help of a British financial adviser. Persian customs receipts will be security for the loan.

Various provisions of the agreement will enable Great Britain to back Persia in realizing several unsatisfied claims.

Provision is made in the agreement for a revision of the existing treaties between Great Britain and Persia. The agreement recognizes Persia's claim to compensation for material damage suffered at the hands of other belligerents during the war and for certain frontier rectifications.

The Paris Temps on Thursday said that the proposed departure from Teheran of the Shah of Persia on a visit to Europe had been hastened by the feeling aroused in Teheran over the signing of an agreement with Great Britain. The paper said that the agreement seemingly would result in Great Britain being the only power to exercise influence in Persia.

LONDON, August 17.

Within six weeks of the signing of the covenant of the league of nations, which provides in article 8 for the fixing of the scale of national armaments by the council of the league, Great Britain has entered into an agreement with Persia to supply that country with such military officers, munitions, and equipment as may be considered necessary.

Furthermore, Great Britain is to supply and Persia to pay for whatever expert advisers are deemed to be necessary after a consultation between the two Governments. The money for improving conditions in Persia, amounting to $10,000,000, will be loaned by Great Britain at the comfortable interest of 7 per cent, while as further evidence of her good will England is prepared to cooperate in the revision of the treaties already in force with Persia, the first in regard to Persia's claim to compensation for material damage inflicted by the other belligerents, and the second in regard to the rectification of Persia's frontier where it is agreed to be justifiable.

For months past the Persian delegation in Paris has been seeking to lay specific questions before the conference. It has been reported that every nation represented in Paris has been perfectly willing to hear Persia's statements except Great Britain. For example, it was desired to engage certain French educationals for Persia, but this was vetoed by the British for the purpose of maintaining their monopoly. By obtaining this monopoly Great Britain has placed herself in a position to do for Persia what Persia desired the peace conference to do in the name of all the Allies.

Practically, Persia now forms a link in the chain of British influence from Egypt to the antipodes. Especially important is the bearing of this new agreement upon future relations between Great Britain and Russia, which in prewar days pursued a policy of active aggression in northern Persia and is practically certain to hold similar aspirations when a stable government is established in the former empire of the Czar.

Under the old régime Persia practically was divided between Russia and Great Britain, the former taking the northern part, including Teheran, the capital, and the British the south, with a neutral zone between. The treaty by which this was done still is in effect, and there is little doubt that in time Russia will claim that it is still a binding agreement, which might entail grave possibilities as between Russia and England.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has rendered a very valuable service in calling attention to the basic selfishness that has actuated the representatives of most of the nations participating in the congress at Versailles. It is the conviction of the people of this country, and I think of the people of the world, that there was one nation and but one nation represented at that congress or now represented at that congress which has no selfish purposes to subserve. The chief representative there from our country, the President of the United States, has most notably stood for the sentiment of unselfishness so far as it was manifested in that great gathering; but I desire to inquire, Mr. President, of the Senator from Illinois what encouragement has been given to the President of the United States in his efforts to inject a little unselfishness, a little consideration for the principles of justice, in his great work in that body? Is it not a fact that the Senator from Illinois and other party friends of his have seized every opportunity to speak with scorn and contempt of "idealistic efforts" of the President of the United States? What more, then, can be expected of the representatives of other countries, who have their own selfish interests to subserve, when our own people speak in this manner of any effort to proceed along other lines?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, since the Senator from Montana has asked that question I will go so far as to say, by way of reply, that, in so far as I am able, I expect to show that under articles 10 and 11 of the treaty the wrongs done in Asia and the fruits of the selfish and perfidious policy of the past are guaranteed to the wrongdoer.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am struck by the observation of the Senator from Montana. He asks what is being done by any of the Senators—the party friends of the Senator from Illinois—to counsel or to console the President of the United States in his attempt to inject altruism or idealism into our relations with foreign countries. I have to plead guilty to being one of the party friends of the Senator from Illinois and also to being one of those who have not approved of very many of the provisions of the proposed treaty. For myself I may say that I have no criticism of the President of the United States or of the American negotiators of the treaty—and, of course, as the Senator well knows, that means the negotiator, the President of the United States—where the President of the United States has attempted to inject any idealistic theories or altruistic doctrines into the document, nor where he has attempted to express himself altruistically or idealistically, nor where he has attempted to lead the American people idealistically or altruistically. I have no objection to any of these matters at all except where, in my judgment, such attempted injection of idealism or altruism would result disastrously to the people of the United States by entangling them in such agreements or covenants as would obligate them even morally, by force of arms or by economic pressure or otherwise, to carry out such idealistic theories or altruistic doctrines, where in many cases, in my judgment, the people themselves directly affected or to be affected by such idealistic theories or altruistic doctrines do not themselves want such doctrines put in effect nor such idealism preached to them. This is the line of departure apparently in so far as the general good of the world is concerned.

The fact that I am a party friend of the Senator from Illinois would not lead me either to criticize the President of the United States or to vote against his policies unless I believed that such policies would now and in the future menace the Government or the peace or the prosperity of the citizens of the United States. In many instances, in looking into matters of this kind, exercising my very best judgment, and using all my ability in endeavoring to ascertain what is meant by many of the provisions of the treaty and by many of the utterances of the President of the United States, I have determined definitely in my own mind that to attempt to crystallize such theories and such altruistic doctrines in a great treaty of peace, so called, would result not in eventual peace, or even any peace for the present, but would result in future wars; that the United States in adopting such theories may be of itself assisting in bringing about or perpetuating such wars, and would, in the future at any rate, jeopardize its own peace and its own interests and those of its own people in some future wars.

That is a selfish doctrine as compared with the altruistic doctrine or the idealistic theory. I admit that to start with, and I admit that when the interests of the people of the world, socially and commercially, are concerned I may be able to see beyond the seas on either side and possibly almost as far as can the Senator from Montana toward the North or the South Pole. He can see farther when the political interests of the United States are concerned, apparently, than I can; because I admit that when it becomes a question of the political interests of the people of the United States as differentiated from the interests of the other peoples of the world I desire to guard such expression of such interests so that first, last, and all the time will the interests of the people of the United States be guarded. Therefore politically I may not be able to see beyond the "horizon" of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I can recall no instance when the Senator from New Mexico has subjected himself in any degree to whatever reproach may have been implied in any of my remarks addressed to the Senator from Illinois. I give the Senator from New Mexico the credit for the very highest motives in the stand he has taken in reference to the ratification of the treaty that is now before us for consideration, and I quite agree with him in much that he has said.

We entered the Great War, Mr. President, for the protection of our own rights and to safeguard the interests of our own people; but when we were in it it was a great source of satisfaction to us that in accomplishing that result for our own people we were conferring lasting and inestimable benefits upon peoples struggling for liberty all over the world. So, likewise, in the treaty that is before us it will be the duty of every Senator to consider what action he should take with respect to what is to the interest of this country.

I am supporting the treaty because I believe it is for the future welfare of the people of this country that the treaty should be ratified. I hope and expect that it will save our people, our citizens, from the burdens and from the tragedies of another great world war, but in accomplishing that result I feel a gratification that we shall bring equally great benefits and advantages to all the people of the world.

Mr. President, speaking about Shantung, to which the Senator from Illinois adverted, everybody recognizes that the provision in relation to Shantung is simply an application of the old principle under which wars were waged, that "to the victors belong the spoils." In other words, Mr. President, in that particular instance the principles of justice, the principles of right announced by the President as those upon which the treaty ought to be negotiated, were departed from. Everybody recognizes that he was unable in every feature of the treaty to obtain recognition for the principles for which he so nobly stood. But, Mr. President, it occurs to me that it comes with ill grace from any man who did not stand behind him and back him up in the enunciation of those principles to endeavor now to bring discredit upon the work of the conference by asserting that therein the principles of selfishness, the doctrines of the old statesmanship, obtained to a greater or lesser degree. If a man backed up the President in the matter, he might then speak with some degree of regret about the matter rather than with contempt.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the dean emeritus of the law school of the University of Missouri presenting a legal phase of the high cost of living, which is new. If there is no objection, I ask that it be placed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI, LAW SCHOOL,
Columbia, Mo., August 13, 1919.

DEAR SENATOR SPENCER: I follow rather closely the contents of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as I have besides yourself several friends in your august body whose speeches I like to read. Senators in attacking high prices in Washington have referred to the hotels and restaurants and the outrageous charges of some of them. And I note in the newspapers of this week that in a number of our cities the proprietors of leading hotels are announcing that on account of the closing of the bar they will be forced to still greater increase in their rates. Now, I am not a prohibitionist, as you know, but in my travels abroad I have frequently put up at the temperance hotels in London and other English cities and towns. I found them always well kept and most comfortable, and their rates a little lower than at the hotels with the same accommodations where liquors were served or which had a bar. So this reason is, I imagine, sheer camouflage to deceive the public and head off any protest by putting the blame on the antiliquor legislation.

My attention was first called to this subject many years ago. During the Louisiana Purchase Exhibition at St. Louis I had lodgings in a private family near the fair grounds, but one night was stranded downtown through a railroad breakdown and had to go to a leading hotel. The night clerk said that he could not tell me the price as the bookkeeper had gone to bed, but I was taken to a rather small room which I occupied, the clerk saying that he would make it all right in the morning. Next morning a new face was in the office and when I asked for my bill was told that it was $15 for exactly six hours' occupancy. I replied that I could rent a farmhouse with 500 acres and all the machinery for running it in Boone County for less than that sum per day and refused to pay it, telling the clerk that he could sue me or send me a reasonable bill as he chose. A week later I received a bill for $5, which I paid.

When I got home I made the incident the subject of a lecture to my law class on the regulation of charges of public agencies, and later made a thorough examination of the law on the subject from the earliest times.

Being myself the author of a book on the Law of Bailments I have given the subject considerable study, and without citing the decided cases I would like to put before you my conclusions.

The common law—which in this respect we have closely followed in the United States—recognized the right of the legislature to regulate the charges of public agencies. But what callings fell within the rule varied from time to time. There was a period when the tailor and the blacksmith were so regarded; another period when the farrier and the physician came under this description, but at the end of the seventeenth century these had disappeared. But two classes had from the earliest history been regarded as public callings and have continued until this day, viz, the common carrier and the innkeeper.

In the United States there has never been a dispute as to these two and to them have been added in recent years other modern agencies unknown to the era of the common law, such as the telegraph and telephone, the grain elevator, gas and water companies, and so forth.

We have been very vigilant in regulating the charges of the common carrier, proceeding on the common-law rule that the charges of the carrier must be reasonable. But how is it that the innkeeper, while subject to State and municipal laws as to other matters of regulation of business, has entirely escaped the rate regulation of the railroad, the street car, the telegraph, the telephone, and the gas and water companies? I can find hardly any instance of legislative or municipal rate regulation of the hotel keeper since colonial times. Instead of that, the curious result has come about that while the railroad has been compelled to lower its rates for passengers, the hotel keeper has not only not been touched, but has been encouraged to raise his rates for guests. At the St. Louis Fair the city demanded that the railroads reduce their rates, and they did so at once, while nobody demanded that the hotels would reduce theirs, but, on the contrary, expected that they would increase them.

Yet the same legal principle applies to both. The law says that being public agencies the railroad and the innkeeper must receive all that apply so long as he has room, that he must make no discrimination for the same service, and that his charges in the absence of legislation fixing them must be reasonable. Fancy a railroad saying, "There is such a crowd coming on my cars next week to Washington that the rates of fare will be doubled." But that is just what the innkeeper always does.

Yet both, according to the common law, are under the same obligation, whether passengers and guests are few or many. Neither is bound to take more than he has accommodations for; the first come are entitled to be first served, but neither the one nor the other has a legal right to charge the passengers or guests he has room for a higher rate than his usual rate simply because more patrons are presenting themselves than he can accommodate.

I am sure that this is a point which has occurred to few people. I can find no qualification of the common-law rule as to the reasonable charge of the innkeeper in the judicial reports, so it is still the law of the land.

When you come to examine the matter by comparison, you soon find that the charge for hotel accommodation in this country has always been too high. Even $2 a day seems too much for a simple, small room when you compare it with the rent of a whole house. Before the war you could get a very comfortable residence in our towns for $60 a month. You know my residence here—a flourishing city of 15,000; you know my roomy house of 12 or 13 rooms, better furnished than the average hotel, with garden and grounds and magnificent shade trees. When I was abroad several summers and winters studying the European criminal procedure I thought myself fortunate to rent it furnished for $60 a month, and if I were to rent it to-day in these times I could not get more than 30 per cent advance. Yet the local hotels, for a stuffy room not large enough in which to swing a cat, would want this much at least.

I have intended to draw attention to this phase of the law of innkeepers in some law journal, but other matters have prevented me.

I would suggest that Congress should try a hotel rate regulation law in the District of Columbia. There it would clearly have jurisdiction after the war. And all over the land it could extend that law so as to cover travelers from other States. This would be absolutely effective, for no city or town or State would very long permit its own citizens to be charged higher rates than the citizens of other States or foreigners.

Very sincerely,

JOHN D. LAWSON, LL. D.,
Dean Emeritus.

AFFAIRS IN KOREA.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a sworn statement of Mr. Homer B. Hulbert, who was for 23 years a resident of Korea and the confidential adviser of the Emperor of Korea. This statement presents information which I think Senators will be glad to read. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
District of Columbia, city of Washington, ss:

Homer B. Hulbert, being duly sworn, says that he sojourned in Korea for 23 years; that he was sent to Korea shortly after the signing of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Korea, which was executed in 1882, by the State Department of the United States, and at the request of the Korean Government, to assist in the organization of a school system in Korea. That during the 23 years that he was in Korea he became the friend and confidant of the Emperor of Korea and became intimately acquainted with political and general conditions in Korea and considers himself competent to speak the facts as to those conditions. That he has prepared the attached statement and summary of facts and conditions, and that said statement is true. That he has in his possession the originals of which reproductions are attached to said statement and knows that they are authentic, and stands ready and offers to produce the same in any legislative or judicial tribunal that is or may be considering the questions affecting the Korean situation.

H. B. HULBERT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of August, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.] HUGH W. BARR,
Notary Public.

WHAT ABOUT KOREA?

The time has arrived when it seems necessary to lay before the American people some facts bearing upon request of the Korean people that they be freed from the tyranny of Japan. This request was made by millions of that nation in a perfectly peaceful way on March 1, 1919, and was met by a perfect orgy of abuse and persecution on the part of the military authorities there. Thousands of people were beaten, tortured, and even killed, and women were treated with obscene brutality.

In order to show the genesis of this remarkable moral and patriotic uprising in which the Koreans, realizing clearly the tragic consequences of their demand, stood up and declared that death is preferable to a continuance of the present situation, it will be necessary to review briefly the course of Japanese policy in that country.

There has never been a time in history, from 600 B. C. to the present time, when Japan has not exhibited a hostile and aggressive spirit toward the Korean people and Government. For 2,000 years it was a series of robber raids and attempted extortions on the part of Japan, until in 1390 A. D. a Korean general succeeded in inflicting such punishment upon the corsairs that they ceased for a time their raids. But in 1592 the Japanese invaded the country with an immense army, and it was only after seven years of sanguinary strife that combined Korean and Chinese armies finally expelled the invaders. It is said that 20 per cent of the Korean population perished in this conflict. It put a stop to Japanese aggression for 300 years.

When Korea was opened to foreign relations, about the year 1882, Japan immediately began to exercise her baneful influence again. In 1884 she organized and supported by force of arms an insurrection in Korea, in which every minister of the King's cabinet was murdered in cold blood before his very eyes. In 1895, after the Japan-China War, though formally recognizing the independence of Korea, Japan made such outrageous demands, economic and commercial, that the Queen of Korea put her foot down and used her great influence to veto the proposition. Therefore the accredited minister of Japan to Korea sent into the palace a band of ruffians, who killed the Queen and incinerated her body, nothing being found but one little finger.

But, not content with this, the Japanese forced upon the King a cabinet of traitors, who held the King a prisoner, and through these tools they compelled the King to put out an edict degrading his dead Queen, the mother of his children, to the position virtually of a prostitute. Perhaps the reader will see why the Koreans have never been eager to accept "western civilization" at the hands of the Japanese.

But Korea managed to hold off the Japanese until after the Japan-Russia War. It will be remembered that at the beginning of that war Japan made a treaty with Korea guaranteeing her perpetual independence. The fact that such treaty was entirely insincere and that the Japanese had no intention of keeping it has nothing to do with the binding nature of the treaty. But it became immediately evident that Japan had no intention of implementing that treaty honestly. She allowed her people to abuse and rob the Koreans without affording any means for redress. She kept encroaching thus until it became evident that the treaty was in her eyes merely a "scrap of paper."

The Emperor of Korea, being aware of the fact that in his treaty with America there was a clause in which the American Government promised to use its good offices if Korea was endangered and announced the fact to us, determined to appeal to our Government to carry out that important clause of the treaty. The following is a translation of his letter to the Washington Government:

Ever since 1883 the United States and Korea have been in friendly treaty relations. Korea has received many proofs of the good will and the sympathy of the American Government and people. The American Representatives have always shown themselves to be in sympathy with the welfare and progress of Korea. Many teachers have been sent from America who have done much for the uplift of our people.

But we have not made the progress that we ought. This is due partly to the political machinations of foreign powers and partly to our mistakes. At the beginning of the Japan-Russia war the Japanese Government asked us to enter into an alliance with them, granting them the use of our territory, harbors, and other resources, to facilitate their military and naval operations. Japan, on her part, guaranteed to preserve the independence of Korea and the welfare and dignity of the royal house. We complied with Japan's request, loyally lived up to our obligations, and did everything that we had stipulated. By so doing we put ourselves in such a position that if Russia had won, she could have seized Korea and annexed her to Russian territory on the ground that we were active allies of Japan.

It is now apparent that Japan proposes to abrogate their part of this treaty and declare a protectorate over our country in direct contravention of her sworn promise in the agreement of 1904. There are several reasons why this should not be done.

In the first place, Japan will stultify herself by such a direct breach of faith. It will injure her prestige as a power that proposes to work according to enlightened laws.

In the second place, the actions of Japan in Korea during the past two years give no promise that our people will be handled in an enlightened manner. No adequate means have been provided whereby redress could be secured for wrongs perpetrated upon our people. The finances of the country have been gravely mishandled by Japan. Nothing has been done toward advancing the cause of education or justice. Every move on Japan's part has been manifestly selfish.

The destruction of Korea's independence will work her a great injury, because it will intensify the contempt with which the Japanese people treat the Koreans and will make their acts all the more oppressive.

We acknowledge that many reforms are needed in Korea. We are glad to have the help of Japanese advisers, and we are prepared loyally to carry out their suggestions. We recognize the mistakes of the past. It is not for ourselves we plead, but for the Korean people.

At the beginning of the war our people gladly welcomed the Japanese, because this seemed to herald needed reforms and a general bettering of conditions, but soon it was seen that no genuine reforms were intended and the people had been deceived.

One of the gravest evils that will follow a protectorate by Japan is that the Korean people will lose all incentive to improvement. No hope will remain that they can ever regain their independence. They need the spur of national feeling to make them determine upon progress and to make them persevere in it. But the extinction of nationality will bring despair, and instead of working loyally and gladly in conjunction with Japan, the old-time hatred will be intensified and suspicion and animosity will result.

It has been said that sentiment should have no place in such affairs, but we believe, sir, that sentiment is the moving force in all human affairs, and that kindness, sympathy, and generosity are still working between nations as between individuals. We beg of you to bring to bear upon this question the same breadth of mind and the same calmness of judgment that have characterized your course hitherto, and, having weighed the matter, to render us what aid you can consistently in this our time of national danger.

[Private Seal of the Emperor of Korea.]

It will be noted that in sending this letter the Emperor of Korea was fulfilling a necessary part of the contract, for by failing so to appeal he would forfeit the benefits of the treaty. He entrusted that letter to me to deliver into the hands of the President of the United States. I showed it to the American minister in Seoul, Korea, and for two reasons: First, I was unwilling to do anything that might look like mere intrigue. I was under no obligation to make public my mission, but as an American citizen I thought it incumbent upon me to acquaint my own authorities with what was to happen. In the second place, it was evident that Japan might attempt to seize Korea at any moment, and I wanted the Government in Washington to know in advance that such a letter was on the way, so that if Japan should use force upon the Korean Emperor and cabinet during the transmission of that document the American Government might delay action in regard to recognition of the downfall of Korea until the letter should arrive and could be taken into consideration.

The Japanese suspected that something was on foot. It may be that the American minister told them. The sequel warrants such suspicion. At any rate, the Japanese immediately began to bring pressure upon the Emperor and his cabinet to give Japan a protectorate; but it was peremptorily refused. The Emperor was desperately trying to hold them off until the letter should be presented in Washington. Day after day they worked until that letter had passed Yokohama, Honolulu, San Francisco, Denver, and St. Louis. At Cincinnati it was still one day from Washington, and the Japanese were desperate. That night they broke into the palace and filled it with armed Japanese. They brought the Emperor and the cabinet together and made a final and menacing demand for the instant signing of a treaty of protectorate. All protested their utter unwillingness to sign. The Japanese took Mr. Han Kyu-Sul, the prime minister, into a side room, and Field Marshal Hasegawa, the same who is now governor general of Korea, drew his sword and demanded his consent. It was refused. They left him there under guard and went back to the rest of the cabinet and asked them if they would sign now. Being sure that Han Kyu-Sul had been killed and that they also would be killed, three of them signed the document. But it still required the seal of State. The Emperor had secretly dispatched a man to throw this seal into the lake, but the Japanese managed to secure it and attached the seal to the document. This was done almost at the very instant the letter reached Washington.

As yet unaware of the tragedy that was happening in Seoul, I sent to the President saying that I was bearer of an important document from the Emporer. Of course, this fact had been cabled on from Korea by the American minister, and I supposed that the President would be not only willing but eager to see the letter; but instead of that I received the astounding answer that the President would not receive it. I cast about in my own mind for a possible reason, but could imagine none. I went to the State Department with it, but was told that they were too busy to see me. Remember that at that very moment Korea was in her death throes; that she was in full treaty relations with us; that there was a Korean legation in Washington and an American legation in Seoul. I determined that there was something here that was more than mere carelessness. There was premeditation in the refusal. There was no other answer. They said I might come the following day. I did so and was told that they were still too busy, but might come the next day. I hurried over to the White House and asked to be admitted. A secretary came out and without any preliminary whatever told me in the lobby that they knew the contents of the letter, but that the State Department was the only place to go. I had to wait till the next day. But on that same day, the day before I was admitted, the administration, without a word to the Emperor or Government of Korea or to the Korean legation, and knowing well the contents of the undelivered letter, accepted Japan's unsupported statement that it was all satisfactory to the Korean Government and people, cabled our legation to remove from Korea, cut off all communication with the Korean Government, and then admitted me with the letter.

The following is the receipt which I received:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 25, 1905.

H. B. HULBERT, Esq.,
23 Union Avenue, Mount Vernon, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: The letter from the Emperor of Korea which you intrusted to me has been placed in the President's hands and read by him.

In view of the fact that the Emperor desires that the sending of the letter should remain secret, and of the fact that since intrusting it to you the Emperor has made a new agreement with Japan disposing of the whole question to which the letter relates, it seems quite impracticable that any action should be based upon it.

Very truly, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

The reference to secrecy was because the Emperor was anxious not to have the Japanese know what was going on. Perhaps it is not the first time that an important document of state has been withheld from public comment, at least until it has been delivered. The fact of its being too late was because they held off for two days, until it was too late.

The next day I received the following cablegram from the Emperor. It was taken across from Korea to Cheefoo, so as not to be sent over Japanese wires:

"I declare that the so-called treaty of protectorate recently concluded between Korea and Japan was extorted at the point of the sword and under duress, and therefore is null and void. I never consented to it and never will. Transmit to American Government.

"THE EMPEROR OF KOREA."

I took that cablegram to the State Department and put it into the hands of the Assistant Secretary of State, who merely said that he would put it on file. Those two documents which are, or ought legally to be, on file in the archives of the State Department are conclusive proof of the wholly illegal character of Japan's occupation of Korea. Of course brute force can and will have its way, but to-day Korea is de jure a free and independent government, and in demanding physical and actual independence Korea is asking nothing that is not morally and legally her own. The world is talking about Shantung, but Japan's occupation of Korea is fully as illegal as her occupation of Shantung. It is even more illegal, for Japan took Shantung from Germany and not directly from China. I am not defending Japan in Shantung. That occupation is an outrage that calls for and will receive justice in the long run, but Korea was directly stolen without even a decent pretense. In the one case Japan is the receiver of stolen goods; in the other she herself is the original culprit. The fact that some time has elapsed does not validate her claim to Korea nor, in the eyes of respectable people, will the acquiescence of all the great powers in Japan's seizure of Korea render that seizure the less damnable.

It has been said that Korea deserved no sympathy, because she made no effort to oppose the act. This is based wholly upon misapprehension of the facts and upon Japan's excellent control of news sources. For five years the Koreans, by thousands, fought as best they could among the mountains, freezing and starving in the wintertime. Once an entire regiment of Japanese was overwhelmed and destroyed, their gattling gun was taken away among the hills. The Japanese called them bandits. If so, then Garibaldi was a footpad, Cromwell was a bandit, Paul Jones was a pirate, and George Washington at Valley Forge was a brigand.

The women of Korea gave their jewels to sell to save their country. Even the prostitutes came by scores and laid at their country's feet the profits of their nameless toil. Never in history has there been shown more splendid patriotism than the Koreans have exhibited.

If it be said that the Emperor was resigned to this ignominious fate, I will show that this, too, is an error. Although a prisoner in his palace in the hands of the Japanese, he delivered into my hands in June, 1907, a letter to each of the great powers, the United States, Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Italy, couched in identical terms, of which the following is the letter to England:

"To His Majesty the King of England, greeting:

"For many years the Government of Korea has been in friendly treaty relations with the Government of Great Britain and has often received evidences of the good will of that power. In this time of our difficulty we feel sure that all people who desire to see justice done will sympathize with us. In order to show that great injustice has been done us we hereby declare that the so-called treaty of November 18, 1905, was fraudulent, because (1) the signatures of certain members of our cabinet were obtained by intimidation and under duress, (2) we never authorized the cabinet to sign the document, and (3) the meeting of the cabinet at which it was signed was illegal, having been convened neither at our call nor that of the prime minister, but by the Japanese themselves.

"We denounce that document as invalid in law and we declare that under no circumstances will we voluntarily consent to the ratification of any instrument which impairs the independence of the Korean Empire.

"Furthermore, in view of the violent manner in which the so-called treaty of last November was carried through we deem it necessary and proper to declare to you that if at any future time any power shall claim to have obtained our consent to such an agreement, that claim will either be wholly false or will be based upon acts wrung from us by force of arms or under threats of personal violence.

"In view of the fact that we are at the present time de jure an independent power, we earnestly request you to reassert your right to establish a legation at Seoul, or at least to prepare for such establishment by helping us to bring the matter before The Hague tribunal, in order that the validity of our claim to independence may be legally established.

"Any further information that may be desired will be given by our fully accredited envoy at whose hand we are transmitting this document.

"In witness whereof we here affix the imperial seal.

"Done in Seoul this 22d day of June, A. D. 1906, and of the dynasty the five hundred and fifteenth year."

Together with these letters he gave me another constituting me his fully accredited envoy to each of these Governments:

"By virtue of the power vested in us as the Emperor of Korea and in accordance with the right granted us in the treaties between Korea and the various friendly powers, we hereby constitute and appoint Homer B. Hulbert as our special envoy to the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Belgium, and China; and we hereby delegate to him full authority to represent our interests and those of the Korean Empire at the seat of each of those Governments.

"In connection with this we have instructed him to deliver to each of these Governments a document relative to the present political situation in Korea and to take such steps as may lead to the peaceful settlement of the difficulties which have arisen between our Government and that of Japan.

"We hereby give him special authority to secure the adjustment of the matter before the peace conference at The Hague.

"In witness whereof we here affix the imperial seal.

"Done in Seoul this 22d day of June, A. D. 1906, and of the dynasty the five hundred and fifteenth year."

When I left Korea with this in the summer of 1907 the Japanese again suspected, and the very day I landed in America they forcibly deposed the Emperor, and thus automatically canceled my credentials. But the point I make is this: The Emperor to his last hour protested against the enslavement of his people, even at the risk of his life.

Two years later, in 1909, the Emperor, fearing that the Japanese might learn of the fact that his private fortune was deposited in the Deutsch Asiatic Bank in Shanghai and would compel him to turn it over to them, sent out to me from his palace, under the skirts of a scrubwoman, the receipts for that investment together with his autograph letter constituting me his financial agent to collect that money and use it according to his directions. I succeeded in getting those papers out of Korea on the person of an American woman, who took them to China for me. I was at the time in some peril, for the Japanese papers charged me with being at the heart of the conspiracy to assassinate Prince Ito, and I was warned to fly the country. I had been intending to go to China to attend to the Emperor's affairs, but when this outrageous charge was made I determined to stay right in Korea lest my departure might give color to the charge. The Japanese Government put a swarm of plain-clothes men about me to guard me against assassination, for, though I may not escape the charge of egotism in saying it, they knew that the Korean people would actively resent any attack upon me, and they did not want any disturbance. At the same time two American secret-service men put themselves at my service and accompanied me not only to China but all the way across Siberia as far as Warsaw. In Shanghai I learned that the German bank had turned over to the Japanese the entire private fortune of the Emperor. It was a pitiful sum, after all, only about $100,000, but the Japanese must have it. They seemingly connived with the Germans and managed to get the money transferred. I have preserved the papers all these years as a sacred trust, and if Korea ever gets out of the hands of Japan, as God grant she may, the Japanese will have to give an accounting of that theft as well as the rest. Of course, I shall be charged with having tried to get the Emperor's fortune into my own hands for selfish reasons. I am willing to abide the charge.

The confidence which the Emperor reposed in me and the years that I have spent in fighting for the rights of the Korean people will be sufficient in their eyes to exonerate me from such a calumny. It will not be for the first time. When I bought thousands of Koreans' farms at one-half a cent apiece simply to put my name down upon their boundary posts, so that the Japanese might not be able to club the farmer from his home and take the land for nothing, one of the most assiduous of Japan's apologists in this country circulated the report that I had sold those farms at good prices and had made a fortune. I have given all those farms back to the original owners, and have never seen even my half cent back. I say that I have given them all back, but that is a slight error. I hear from the good American in Korea through whom I am doing it that it is almost completed. He has only 1 peck of land deeds left.

The people of America have read in all the papers the indescribable atrocities of which Japan has been guilty during the last few months. And now Japan, whipped to it by public opinion, says that the military party has gone too far and reforms will be instituted. The apologists of Japan have been saying that the civil party will change all that. Well, I ask the American public to note that the following things were common occurrences in Korea when the civil party was dominant there and Prince Ito was the governor general:

(1) Because three Koreans, maddened by the fact that all their land had been taken by the Japanese for railroad purposes, without a cent of immediate or prospective payment, went out one night and tore up a few feet of construction track they were taken out and crucified and then shot to pieces. There are hundreds of photographs of this pleasing event.

(2) When a telegraph line was cut near a country village by parties unknown, but presumably by Korean guerrilla fighters, the Japanese came and burned down 10 villages and left the people to freeze and starve during the winter. One old man, over 80 years old, on his knees begged them to spare his home. The Japanese ran him through with their swords and threw his body into the burning rafters of his own home.

(3) Within a stone's throw of my own house in Seoul, Korea, a Korean lived who refused to sell his house to the Japanese for one-quarter its value. One night six Japanese, stripped stark naked, broke into the house and shocked the inmates so that they deserted the house and fled to the country, and the Japanese got the place for nothing.

(4) A Korean merchant came to Seoul to buy goods, and placed his money in the hands of a Japanese broker to change for him, but when he came for his money the broker said he had already paid it, although the Korean still held the receipt. Only by the intervention of an American was the Korean able to get his money. The Japanese authorities utterly refused to listen to his claim. There was no place of any kind provided by the Japanese where a Korean could come and ask for justice.

(5) A Presbyterian hospital had 40 cases in one month of Koreans who came begging to be cured of the morphine habit which the Japanese had taught them. And although Americans caught Japanese red-handed in the act of selling morphine to Koreans and notified the authorities, not a thing was done to stop the damnable traffic.

(6) The Japanese introduced thousands of prostitutes into Korea and offered opportunities for vice such as the Koreans had never dreamed of. And the spread of venereal diseases was greatly increased.

(7) A woman came to me in great distress, saying that the Japanese had demanded her house for $25, and that if she did not sell it they would dig under the corner posts and let the roof fall on her. She begged me to buy her house for 5 cents and put my card on the door, which I did, and by doing so saved her house.

(8) A Korean business man leased his store to Japanese, who after the first month refused to pay any more and refused to leave. He tried every method to get at the Japanese authorities, but without success. He came to me, and after several weeks we secured the ousting of the Japanese.

(9) A Japanese asked a country gentleman to give him lodging overnight, which the Korean did. In the evening the Japanese drew out a box of pills and said they were good for the digestion. He offered one to his host who took it. In the morning the Japanese before leaving demanded $15 as payment for the pill, and as the Korean refused to pay, he went out to the stable, unhitched the Korean's horse, and drove it away to market. If the Korean had laid a finger on the Japanese he would have been severely handled if not killed.

(10) One night two Koreans who had been cruelly tortured by the Japanese police came to my house and talked with me. I published the facts in my magazine, the Korea Review. Prince Ito sent to me, demanding the names of the men who had come to me. I refused to give them, for it would have meant severe punishment for them.

These are just a few of the many cases that came to me for help under a civil régime, at a time when Korea was governed by a man who claimed to be humane and who was probably the most decent Japanese that could be found. I sent personally to Prince Ito and told him that if he would make some office or tribunal where I could bring Koreans who had been outraged and abused by the Japanese, simply to get a hearing, I would immediately cease from any public comment on Japan's actions in Korea. But he contemptuously refused. In fact he never even replied. He had no intention of giving the Koreans a "square deal."

For this and a score of other reasons I affirm that Japan's proposal to effect reforms in Korea by establishing there a mixed civil and military régime is ludicrous. The very fact that they include the military shows that they propose to govern Korea by intimidation, whatever be the name under which it is carried out.

There is no right solution of the question except the restoration of the complete independence of the Korean people. They have always been so abused and insulted by the Japanese that the continuation of any Japanese control is simply unbearable. The Koreans will not consent to it, and either they must be made free or else the world must look on and see the rapid extinction of a nation of 18,000,000 people who are intrinsically far more "civilized" than are the Japanese themselves.

Japan, as at present conducted, is an anachronism. There is no room for brutal autocracy in this world from now on to the crack of doom. The sooner the Japanese people come to realize this and determine to take things in hand and oust the bureaucrats the better for them and for the whole world. The question will never be settled without a complete revolution in Japan. The sooner it comes the better.

By virtue of the power vested in us as the Emperor of Korea, and in accordance with the right granted us in the treaties between Korea and the various friendly powers, we hereby constitute and appoint Homer B. Hulbert as our special envoy to the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Belgium, and China; and we hereby delegate to him full authority to represent our interests and those of the Korean Empire at the seat of each of these Governments.

In consonance with this we have instructed him to deliver to each of these Governments a document relative to the present political situation in Korea and to take such steps as may lead to the peaceful settlement of the difficulties which have arisen between our Government and that of Japan.

We hereby give him special authority to secure the adjustment of the matter before the peace conference at The Hague.

In witness whereof we here affix the imperial seal.

To His Majesty the King of England, greeting:

For many years the Government of Korea has been in friendly treaty relations with the Government of Great Britain and has often received evidences of the good will of that power. In this time of our difficulty we feel sure that all people who desire to see justice done will sympathize with us. In order to show that great injustice has been done us we hereby declare that the so-called treaty of November 18, 1905, was fraudulent, because (1) the signatures of certain members of our cabinet were obtained by intimidation and under duress, (2) we never authorized the cabinet to sign the document, and (3) the meeting of the cabinet at which it was signed was illegal, having been convened neither at our call nor that of the prime minister, but by the Japanese themselves.

We denounce that document as invalid in law, and we declare that under no circumstances will we voluntarily consent to the ratification of any instrument which impairs the independence of the Korean Empire.

Furthermore, in view of the violent manner in which the so-called treaty of last November was carried through, we deem it necessary and proper to declare to you that if at any future time any power shall claim to have obtained our consent to such an agreement that claim will either be wholly false or will be based upon acts wrung from us by force of arms or under threats of personal violence.

In view of the fact that we are at the present time de jure an independent power and nation, we request you to reassert your right to establish a legation at Seoul, or at least to prepare for such establishment by helping us to bring the matter before The Hague tribunal, in order that our legal and just claim to independence may be legally established.

Any further information that may be desired will be given by our fully accredited envoy, at whose hand we are transmitting this document.

In witness whereof we here affix the imperial seal.

I desire to draw from the Deutsch Asiatic Bank of Shanghai, China, all the funds that I have there. For this purpose I herewith turn over to you all the papers connected with those funds, including a list of the stocks and bonds and the receipts of the bank therefor. You are hereby authorized to go to the Deutsch Asiatic Bank, examine the certificates of stock or the bonds held for me by that bank, estimate the amount of interest that has accrued on them, and to receive all in my name for transmission to me. This my writing and my seal witness that you have full rights as my agent in respect of this business.

To the American citizen H. B. Hulbert.

CARS FOR COAL SHIPMENT.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on Friday last, I believe, the Director General of Railroads sent to the Senate a report on a resolution which had theretofore been adopted by the Senate, namely, Senate resolution 152, giving certain information concerning the supply of coal cars. This resolution has attracted a little attention throughout the country, and I think it is only fair to the coal operators that their position be likewise presented to the Senate.

Throughout Ohio and West Virginia there has been a very great shortage of the supply of coal cars, which it seems to me is recognized by the coal trade generally, even if it is not recognized by the Director General of Railroads. I have before me here several telegrams, and I think they will be of interest to the Senate. They came to-day. One of them is from C. E. Maurer, president of the Glens Run Coal Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, in which he says:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 16, 1919.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to Hines testimony stating no car shortage, we lost 22 per cent time last half July and 27 per cent first half of August account car shortage. This is general at all mines on Pennsylvania lines. Understand Baltimore & Ohio worse. Is nearly time the Director General was called by somebody.

C. E. MAURER,
President the Glens Run Coal Co.

Another telegram, from Mr. Thomas K. Maher, treasurer of another coal company in Cleveland—the Purseglove-Maher Coal Co.—says:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 16, 1919.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to Hines testimony before Interstate Commerce Commission yesterday, Hines knows that no cars were distributed at all on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad for seven days in succession. Hines knows the Wheeling & Lake Erie have distributed no cars in the No. 8 district this week. Hines knows that Baltimore & Ohio shortage last week amounted to about 50 per cent. His car-distribution department acknowledges these shortages.

THOS. K. MAHER, Treasurer.

I may say that in a conference with one of the staff of Mr. Hines I have been advised that this is in part due to the fact that there has been a strike in the repair shops.

Another telegram, from W. R. Nethken, general manager of the Deep Run Big Vein Coal Co., says:

CUMBERLAND, MD., August 16, 1919.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please ask Walker D. Hines if he is not ashamed of himself when he faces any Member of the United States Senate and says there has not been and is not now serious car shortage in the bituminous coal fields. His statement to you is a gross misrepresentation of facts or proves his absolute ignorance of the true situation.

W. R. NETHKEN,
General Manager Deep Run Big Vein Coal Co.

Another telegram, from Chattanooga, Tenn., says:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., August 16, 1919.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Refer statement Hines, Senate, car shortage not responsible coal shortage. Our mines, Cumberland Valley Division Louisville & Nashville Railroad, southeastern Kentucky, with 14 available days August, have run 6 days, lost 8 days account no cars. If this condition general would make total loss production about 12,000,000 tons.

FEDERAL COAL.

Another correspondent, who is interested in the Cambria Coal Co., which has mines in West Virginia, sent me this morning two photographs showing the long lines of empty, unpainted, unlettered new cars which have been standing on the track at Forrest, Ohio, for two months. This correspondent says:

I am inclosing a photograph of 100 cars standing on the siding of Forrest, Ohio, for more than two months, unlettered and unnumbered.

There are standing on Long siding, Big Four Railroad, Sandusky, Ohio, 47 of the same kind of cars, received on May 30.

There are on Ransom siding, Big Four Railroad, 56 of the same kind of cars, which were received June 6.

We are having more photographs taken, which will show you hundreds of these cars standing on sidings for several months, unused, unlettered, and unnumbered, while the prevailing car shortage exists.

And this morning one of the leading manufacturers of Columbus, Ohio, entered my office and stated to me that there is at least a mile of empty, unlettered, unpainted coal cars on the sidings in Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. President, I think it is only fair to say that perhaps in the early part of this year the coal difficulty was not due so much to car shortage as it was, possibly, to the high price of coal, which made many consumers hesitate about buying, or at least delaying to buy, hoping for better prices. I think that situation has somewhat changed; but the public is little concerned as to whether it is due to the high price of coal or to shortage of cars. It is interested in the coal supply; and while these cars are being manufactured and distributed by the Government through the medium of the Director General of Railroads, I hope there will not be cause for further complaint in this behalf. The report of Friday, made by the Director General of Railroads, indicates that a great number of cars are being supplied, I believe at the rate of about 300 per day. It is unfortunate that these cars were not distributed many moons age.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

THE CALENDAR.

The first business on the calendar was the resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall assure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 600) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Susan A. Nicholas was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SIMON M. PRESTON.

The bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Simon M. Preston was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Simon M. Preston, of Seattle, Wash., $5,838.36, being the amount of the defalcation of D. C. Kearns, a deputy collector under the said Simon M. Preston, who was collector of internal revenue for the first election district of Mississippi from the 1st day of June, 1869, to the 22d day of May, 1873, which sum was repaid to the United States Government by Preston, and its collection by him from D. C. Kearns having been hindered and prevented by the pardon of D. C. Kearns by the President of the United States and the remission of the fine equivalent to that sum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF MOSES M. BANE.

The bill (S. 1479) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

STEAM LIGHTER "CORNELIA."

The bill (S. 1004) for the relief of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia was announced as next in order, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia rising out of a collision between said steam lighter and the United States destroyer Bell in Broad Sound, Boston Harbor, Mass., on the 9th day of August, 1918, for and on account of the losses suffered in said collision by the owner of said steam lighter Cornelia by reason of damages and detention of or the loss of said steam lighter, her boats, engines, boilers, tackle, apparel, furniture, and supplies, may be submitted to the United States court for the district of Massachusetts, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States upon the same principle and measure of liability with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States of America to the owner of said steam lighter Cornelia the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are a number of bills of that character. Some objection was made the other day, and I was about to ask the chairman of the committee whether the objections had resulted in any compromise or any adjustment of the plan of meeting these obligations. If not, I object to the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I was unable to hear the comment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was just stating that the other day this bill, as I recall, and several others of like character, were called up, and objection was made by several Senators—I do not just recall whom—and some suggestion was made as to some general bill by which these claims should be met. I was asking the committee whether or not some composition had been made of those differences? If not, I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, does the Senator understand that they are simply permissive bills?

Mr. KING. I understand that they are more than permissive bills. It seems to me, as I recall the measures, that an obligation would be created which the Government would be compelled, morally, at least, to meet. They are more than permissive. They are bills for the purpose of fixing liabilities; and when the liability is fixed, of course, the obligation would rest upon the legislative branch of Congress to make an appropriation to cover the liability.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that they are simply bills that permit these petitioners to have a day in court; and I can not understand any serious objection being made to an aggrieved claimant having a hearing and a day in court in order to have adjudicated an alleged claim of damages against the Government.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator that the purpose of this bill, as found by the committee, was merely to authorize the presentation of the claim to the Court of Claims. Precisely the same bill was passed by the Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

It does not recognize any liability on the part of the Government, but it does open the way for those who think they have a claim to present it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Senate bill 1670, a bill introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., was objected to the last time the calendar was up for consideration, and it was suggested at that time that the form of that bill be incorporated in the other bills for the relief of the owners of the different steam lighters. I see that no proposition of that kind is presented here to-day; and I think we ought to have an agreement as to the form in which the bills shall pass before we ask for their disposal. On that account, I ask that they go over to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri, who has charge of these bills, whether or not similar bills have been enacted into law by previous Congresses?

Mr. SPENCER. My information is that they have been. The committee, in taking up the consideration of this bill, when they found, first, that the Navy Department had recommended the bill favorably for consideration, and that the only purpose of the bill was to enable the claimant to present his claim to the Court of Claims, and that it had passed the last Senate, had no objection to recommending the bill unanimously.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe that is true as to this bill passing at the last session of Congress; but I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that claims such as are enumerated in these different bills were referred to the Court of Claims under the Tucker Act in past years, as I remember, although none of them that I can call to mind now have ever passed both Houses of Congress and become laws. This, I think the Senator from Missouri will admit, is a new policy for settling such claims as these.

Mr. SPENCER. Such was not my information; but I may say to the Senator from Utah that the gist of the matter is in the single sentence from the Secretary of the Navy in which he states that—

> The department is of the opinion that the owner of the lighter Cornelia is justly entitled to have his claim adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction, and I have therefore the honor to recommend to your committee favorable action on said bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest, in view of the fact that there is a unanimous committee report here, and in view of the fact that there are people trying to recover damages for injuries sustained, that either their bills should be referred back to the committee and a general bill reported or they be taken up and disposed of in these forms; otherwise there is no remedy. It seems to me, in view of the fact that there is absolutely no division in the committee, whose members are as careful of the public funds as any other Senators, that we ought to dispose of these bills, which in themselves are very trivial and of very little consequence, but are for the relief of people who claim to have grievances and damage suits and a right to be heard and have a day in court. They ought not to be put off from week to week and from month to month without having a chance to have their damages settled if they have sustained damages.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that every claim against the Government of the United States should have its day in court, but if we are going to begin to legislate in the case of every little accident that may happen to a lighter or a steamer of any kind we will have very little time left for other business.

I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I will be perfectly willing to pass a general law authorizing claims of this kind to be settled by the Navy Department, or some department of the Government, and let them be settled in that way rather than have bills of this sort coming before Congress in untold number.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not familiar with the procedure. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if it is in order to move to recommit the bill to the committee, that it may consider whether it shall report a general bill or not?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say the committee can take cognizance of what has been said here to-day, and if they desire to report out such a bill I have no doubt there will be favorable action taken upon it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The bill has been on the calendar for a long time.

Mr. SMOOT. If the chairman of the committee feels positive that these bills are just, and that they should be acted upon by Congress, and will take it for granted that they are not to be pointed to as precedents in the future, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, every one of these bills has already been favorably passed by the Senate in the last Congress. They are not new bills.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that only shows that the House took the same position that has been taken in the past.

Mr. SPENCER. No; the House did not vote against them; they were not reached by the House on their calendar. Every one of these bills is fair, so far as the committee knows.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they were reported out in the House.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does anyone object to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP "MATOA."

The bill (S. 1005) for the relief of the owner of the steamship Matoa was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the steamship Matoa arising out of a collision between said steamship and the U. S. tug Lucille Ross off Lambert Point, Va., on the 17th day of January, 1918, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owner of said steamship Matoa by reason of damages to and detention of said steamship may be submitted to the United States Court for the eastern district of Virginia, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due, either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said steamship Matoa, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOONER "HORATIO G. FOSS."

The bill (S. 1006) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Horatio G. Foss was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the schooner Horatio G. Foss, arising out of a collision between said schooner and the U. S. collier Jupiter, off Winter Quarter Light Vessel on the 18th day of May, 1918, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owners of said schooner Horatio G. Foss by reason of damages to and detention of said schooner, may be submitted to the United States court for the district of Massachusetts under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owners of said schooner Horatio G. Foss, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOONER "HENRY O. BARRETT."

The bill (S. 1222) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Henry O. Barrett was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the schooner Henry O. Barrett rising out of a collision between said schooner and the United States monitor Ozark, off Five Fathom Bank Lightship, on the 19th day of April, 1917, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owners of said schooner Henry O. Barrett by reason of damages to and detention of said schooner, may be submitted to the United States court for the district of Massachusetts, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owners of said schooner Henry O. Barrett, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMER "MAYFLOWER."

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the claim with respect to passengers alleged to have sustained injuries?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not familiar with the case and I can not answer as to the facts. Probably the Senator in charge of the bill can do so. I might say that these bills came to me from my predecessor in the last Congress, who said that they had passed the Senate. I am not familiar with this particular bill. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] can no doubt state the facts.

Mr. KING. I shall ask that the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over on objection.

ARUNDEL SAND & GRAVEL CO.

The bill (S. 1670) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware and doing business in the city of Norfolk, Va., owner of the steam tug A. G. Bigelow, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said tug and the U. S. S. Susquehanna in Norfolk Harbor on the 26th day of November, 1917, may be sued for by the said Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co., or against the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co. in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMMA H. RIDLEY.

The bill (S. 174) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

UNITED WAR-WORK CAMPAIGN.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 42) authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to inquire whether there is a united war-work campaign running now to which the banks are subscribing?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is. It is my understanding that the national banks did subscribe, and that this is really to cover a situation which has actually passed.

Mr. KING. It is an ex post facto measure?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is rather legalizing what has already been done in an emergency.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the joint resolution will legalize anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not do anything of the kind.

Mr. SMOOT. It would never touch it in the world.

Mr. KING. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 631) repealing certain provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

WATSON B. DICKERMAN.

The bill (S. 1722) for the relief of Watson B. Dickerman, administrator of the estate of Charles Backman, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I regret that the Senator from Utah makes an objection to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that if we are going into this subject at all, it would be better to have a general law. To-day there is a law allowing so much leakage upon each barrel of spirits in a bonded warehouse. The general rule has been, and I think the law itself has demonstrated, that there is enough allowed for leakage, and I can not see why we should take up such a claim. I suppose there are many other claims of the same character.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know how many others there are. I know that during my service on the Claims Committee I have seen none other than this one. This claimant was denied the right of computing the leakage. The Court of Claims has stated that there is due him $5,335. The Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. SMOOT. He was allowed the regular leakage according to law, was he not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was not.

Mr. SMOOT. For what reason?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was denied it and paid his taxes under protest in 1869—a good many years ago, I admit.

Mr. SMOOT. That was before the leakage law was passed. Really, I do not know where this bill would lead to. It seems to me that every man who had spirits in a bonded warehouse and had some sort of a claim would have had it settled before this time. I think this is a very dangerous bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator from Utah misconstrues the period during which this has been the law and the custom. You will notice that the first paragraph of the preamble states:

Whereas from the time bonded warehouses were first established until April 14, 1869, the law has been uniformly construed and administered to allow for loss by leakage on spirits distilled prior to July 20, 1868, while in warehouse.

The findings of the Court of Claims appear in the preamble on page 3:

Whereas, in response to Senate resolution 301, of March 2, 1907, referring the matter to the Court of Claims for the findings of such fact, the Court of Claims on December 14, 1908 (S. Doc. No. 590, 60th Cong., 2d sess.), found that Charles Dickerman in 1869 was required to pay, and did pay, as tax on distilled spirits withdrawn by him from warehouse, without allowance for leakage, the sum of $45,890.13, being a tax of $5,335.71 in excess of the tax due on the quantity of spirits so withdrawn by him.

The fact that this man and his estate have been endeavoring to collect from the Government what the Government has owed them all these years should not militate against the passage of this bill. The United States owes this man this money. It has been owing it to him for many, many years. The Treasury Department admits it and the Court of Claims admits it, and yet for one reason or another Congress has never seen fit or been able to concentrate attention upon it sufficiently to pay him the money that is due him.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not read the report in full.

Mr. SPENCER. Permit me to say to the Senator from Utah that a similar bill was not only passed by the Senate at the last session, but was favorably reported by the committee of the House. It merely returns to this man Dickerman the excess of taxes which under a mistake he was required to pay. The department certifies that the payment was an error and that the amount ought to be returned to him. The bill has been before Congress for years and the committee has recommended favorable consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it has been here since the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That may have been the fact, but that should not militate against its validity.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know the details of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In several of these cases the conduct of the Government is disgraceful. When the Government owes a man money it should pay him. This is one of those cases certified to by all the authorities of the Government that can be approached in getting an opinion.

Mr. BORAH. What effect will it have on the high cost of living to take this money out of the Treasury?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Idaho ought to remember that this is a case of distilled spirits.

Mr. BORAH. When did this leakage happen?

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator was born. I should like to have the bill go over and I will read the report carefully.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the ancient history of this case. I suppose these people will have to go without their money for another half century.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ALASKA STEAMSHIP CO.

The bill (S. 629) for the relief of the Alaska Steamship Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 7, to strike out the figures $9,024.27 and insert $5,974.27, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Alaska Steamship Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Nevada, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,974.27 in payment of the balance due said company for services rendered at the request of the United States deputy collector of customs at Unalaska, Alaska, and in pursuance of an agreement with him for the transportation and care of 193 survivors of the wreck of the American ship Columbia, near Scotch Cap Lighthouse, Alaska, in May, 1909.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Edward S. Farrow was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, as I have not had a chance to read the report, if he knows what is the reason of this legislation. Is there not any existing law that would permit the promotion if promotion is desired?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to have the bill go over temporarily. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who reported it, is absent.

Mr. KING. I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1726) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1369) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia, and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2496) authorizing the retirement of members of the Army Nurse Corps (female) was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

ORION MATHEWS.

The bill (S. 608) for the relief of Orion Mathews was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, Orion Mathews, late of Battery D, Second Regiment United States Artillery, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private from said battery and regiment on the 22d day of March, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES DUFFY.

The bill (S. 609) for the relief of James Duffy was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, James Duffy, late of Company A, Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of the above organization on the 6th day of October, 1862: Provided, That no pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY J. DAVIS.

The bill (S. 610) for the relief of Henry J. Davis was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

The bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the bill may go over. In this connection I wish to withdraw the notice of last Friday that I would call up the bill for consideration to-day. I will state that at the earliest practicable day I shall move the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

HOUSE CONSTRUCTION AND HOME OWNERSHIP.

The bill (S. 168) to create a commission to investigate and report to Congress a plan on the questions involved in the financing of house construction and home ownership and Federal aid therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

MEMORIAL TO AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I had intended to bring this bill up for consideration to-day, but on the suggestion of a Senator who is now absent I will delay bringing it up, but give notice that I shall call it up at the first opportunity under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

RECREATION ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. 2224) to incorporate the Recreation Association of America was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

KATIE NORVALL.

The bill (S. 1546) for the relief of Katie Norvall was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has just stepped out of the Chamber. He is anxious to have this bill passed, and if there is objection to its consideration I ask that it be temporarily laid aside. If there is no objection, let it be considered. If there is any objection to it the Senator from California desires to make an explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from California were here I should like to have him make an explanation because it calls for an appropriation of $10,000. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending to reduce the amount to $5,000.

Mr. KING. Let it be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from California comes in.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

JOHN M. FRANCIS.

The bill (S. 176) for the relief of John M. Francis was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

AIRCRAFT FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

The bill (S. 2676) to amend section 56 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "supply," to insert "solely for educational purposes," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 56 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, be amended by adding at the end of section 56 the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to supply, solely for educational purposes, aircraft, engines, and aeronautical equipment to any educational institution having a course in aeronautical engineering approved by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATIE NORVALL.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate return to the bill (S. 1546) for the relief of Katie Norvall, which was passed over during my absence.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $10,000 as full compensation to Katie Norvall for the death of her husband, G. Norvall, who was drowned while engaged in the performance of his duties as fireman and engineer, as a result of a collision between the navy yard launch Highlander and the ferryboat Vallejo near the Mare Island ferry slip, Vallejo, Calif.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] tells me that the amount embodied in the bill is not the sum which the committee intended to report and that he desires an amendment to be made striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$1,173.12," being the amount of a year's compensation in this case. I have no objection to the bill with that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment to the bill now pending which has been offered by the Senator from Colorado to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000." The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California now moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, after the words "sum of," it is proposed to strike out "$10,000," and to insert "$1,173.12."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I think the RECORD should show that that amendment was reported by the committee and embodied in their report, though not printed in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REDUCED RATES FOR CERTAIN MACHINE TOOLS.

The bill (S. 2677) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "at," to strike out the numerals "10" and to insert "not less than 20," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to sell at not less than 20 per cent of their cost to trade and technical schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions such machine tools as are suitable for their use which are now owned by the United States of America and are under the control of the War Department and are not needed for Government purposes. The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses incident to distribution of the tools and the balance shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator reporting the bill just what the last part of it really means where it states:

The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses incident to distribution of the tools.

Does that mean that the Secretary shall use a part of this money for paying freight upon the tools shipped to educational institutions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Undoubtedly under that language some of the money might be used in defraying freight charges. These machine tools have to be taken down from the munition plants, oiled, and put in condition, so that they will not deteriorate. Then they have to be crated and packed, which is quite an undertaking. Some of them are very large, some of them are rather complicated, and they ought to have a good deal of care. It is the assumption that the money which will be received for them will more than cover the cost of taking them down and packing and crating them.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that that is as far as we ought to go; but under the wording in the bill it seems to me that the Secretary could undertake, out of the 20 per cent, to pay the freight charges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think he could; and there comes up the question of policy.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be very unwise to do that. I think an institution that really wants these machine tools could at least pay 20 per cent of their cost and also pay the freight charges. Before they could be shipped, of course, I know they would have to be crated and be put in condition so that they would not rust or deteriorate in any way. I think if the Government does that out of the 20 per cent which it receives, that is all that ought to be asked of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know that I have authority to speak for the Committee on Military Affairs, but personally I should have no objection to an amendment on page 2, line 3, after the word "expenses," to insert the words "except freight charges."

Mr. SMOOT. It would be perfectly satisfactory to me if that amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from New York permit an inquiry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. In some instances these tools might be sent by express. Would it not be better to say "costs of transportation," so that it would include all forms of transportation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. Then I offer the amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "expenses," to insert "except costs of transportation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SHELBY BARRIGER.

The bill (S. 2095) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint William Shelby Barriger captain of Cavalry was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no report from the War Department upon this bill. Does the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who reported the bill, know the details in this case?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the facts in the case of the bill are these: Capt. Barriger was enlisted as a private years ago. He gradually worked his way up until he became a captain. He then retired to civil life, and within a few months afterwards became very anxious to get back again, thinking he had made a mistake in retiring. He was unable to get back, because of his age. Later on he got into the present war, and was made a major. It was, however, a temporary appointment, as all such appointments are. At the close of the war he leaves the service unless this bill is enacted, which enables him to reenter the regular service.

As the bill was originally presented to the committee, it provided that he should have the rank of captain and occupy the same relative position in the lineal list that he would have occupied if he had not retired to civil life. That was changed, and he was put at the end of the list of captains, so as to displace no one.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Missouri permit an inquiry?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes.

Mr. KING. How long was he out of the service?

Mr. SPENCER. He was out of the service some years—I can not tell the Senator the exact number. There was a long list of captains whom he would have displaced had he gone back to his regular place.

Mr. KING. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the consideration that largely influenced the committee in its report was the desire to recognize a man who had come up from the enlisted ranks to the position of a commissioned officer, and, therefore, the recommendation contained in the bill was made.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I am very glad to see such recognition accorded; but where a man has retired from the service voluntarily after having reached the grade of captain, and has been out of the service for many years, I think it would be a very bad precedent to restore him and give him the standing which this bill proposes to give him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

FRANK S. BOWKER.

The bill (S. 696) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Frank S. Bowker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $2,759.80 to Frank S. Bowker, of Phippsburg, Me., as managing owner of the schooler William H. Davenport and of the cargo thereof, for the damages caused to the schooner and her cargo of lumber by a collision with the United States lighthouse steamer Azalea, which occurred on the 2d day of October, 1899, as found by the Court of Claims and reported in House Document No. 334 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE B. HUGHES.

The bill (S. 2257) for the relief of George B. Hughes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George B. Hughes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, as compensation for the loss of his right arm while in the performance of his duties as an electrician in the Government Printing Office during the month of January, 1899.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL STATION, PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 562) for the relief of occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment on page 2, line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$30,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the representations of the hardships and losses sustained by the occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla., who were required by an order recently issued by the Secretary of the Navy to give up such premises and remove their dwellings, buildings, and other property therefrom in order that room might be made for the aeronautic station, and the said Secretary is further authorized and directed to allow in such of said cases as are meritorious and may in his judgment be deserving of relief, reasonable compensation for losses and injuries sustained by reason of removals necessitated by the department's said order, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay such sums as the Secretary of the Navy may award and allow hereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the report in that case be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report, submitted by Mr. PAGE from the Committee on Naval Affairs on the 5th instant, was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 562) for the relief of occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla., have considered the same and recommend that the bill do pass with an amendment.

The amendment is as follows:

On line 3 of page 2 of the bill, strike out "$75,000," and insert in lieu thereof, "$30,000."

This measure was considered in the Sixty-fifth Congress, Senate bill 2624, and the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy fully sets forth the facts and is submitted as a part of this report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 21, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the bill, S. 562, entitled "A bill for the relief of occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla.," I have the honor to advise you that, in replying to a similar request of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs on January 26, 1918, with respect to Senate bill 2624, which is substantially identical with Senate bill 562, I then addressed a letter to the chairman of your committee, of which the inclosed is a carbon copy.

Nothing has occurred since that time to occasion me to modify in any respect the opinion therein expressed, and, with the amendment suggested in the last paragraph of the inclosure, namely, that the appropriation carried by the proposed measure, $75,000, be reduced to $30,000, I cheerfully recommend the passage of the proposed legislation.

Sincerely,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Secretary.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 26, 1918.

DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: Replying to the request of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs for the opinion of the department respecting Senate bill 2624, for the relief of occupants of certain premises within the naval station at Pensacola, Fla., I desire to say that the purpose and spirit of this bill meet with my approval, and as indicating the reasons which have in part favorably impressed me with the desirability of the proposed legislation may I be permitted to quote from the last annual report of the solicitor of the department, who has given the subject-matter investigation and who on page 10 of said report says:

"As pointed out in my last report, the establishment and extension of the aeronautic station at Pensacola has resulted in apparent hardship to a number of tenants who had been granted permission to reside within the reservation and whose property was removed by order of the department as a necessary incident to the carrying out of the extensive scheme of improvement and enlargement of that station.

"It should be remembered that many years ago, due to the trouble in obtaining hands for the operation of the yard, at that time difficult of access, the department adopted the policy of encouraging mechanics and other workmen to remove to the reservation, offering as an inducement free license to occupy and improve sites within the reservation, and numbers were thus encouraged to make their homes there and expend their means in the erection of houses and other improvements.

"While it is true that such persons occupied these sites under license or permits, revocable at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy and embodying a provision requiring the licensee in the event of revocation to remove all buildings within a given time, and providing further that in such event no claim should lie against the Government for reimbursement on account of damages sustained by reason thereof, it is nevertheless apparent that a strict and exact requirement of the letter of the bond has in some cases fallen harshly upon those who are least able to sustain reverses, and I refer especially to those tenants who by reason of advancing years, declining health, and indigent circumstances are unable to bear the expenses of removal or of reerection of their houses elsewhere, and to whom the effect of the department's action means the loss of homes without any compensating benefit."

I am of the opinion, however, that the amount of the appropriation carried by the proposed measure, namely, $75,000, is excessive, and that the sum of $30,000 should be substituted by suitable amendment, as being in my judgment entirely adequate for all the purposes contemplated by the bill.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1447) to correct the naval record of Fred C. Konrad was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TUBERCULOSIS DIVISION, UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1660) to provide a division of tuberculosis in, and an advisory council for, the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to object to that bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief explanation of the bill. It is to create a division of tuberculosis in the United States Public Health Service, and I can better explain it by reading briefly from the report of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, Dr. Rupert Blue, dated January 18, 1919. I will not attempt to read it all. He says:

The object of this section—

Referring to section 1 of the bill—is to provide a special administrative division of the United States Public Health Service, the duty of which shall be to study tuberculosis, its causes and prevention, and demonstrate methods for its suppression. In connection with the necessity for establishing such a division, the following is submitted:

Tuberculosis as a cause of death and disability: Tuberculosis is still the greatest single cause of death in the mortality sheets of this Nation. According to the returns of the United States Census Bureau for 1916, tuberculosis caused 101,396 deaths in the registration area of the United States, which comprises 70 per cent of the total population.

Mr. President, this is a very serious matter. It relates to the most important disease that afflicts the human race, and I should be glad if Senators would give attention to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not expect to have the bill passed at this time, does he, without opportunity to give it adequate consideration?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am asking to make a brief explanation of it. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] reserved the right to object until after a brief explanation could be made, and that is all I am trying to do. I want the Senate of the United States to understand this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that the bill should come up at a time when there is a full attendance of the Senate and when we will have an opportunity to discuss it, but I wish to say to the Senator that I shall object to its consideration at this time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator made the same statement several times during the last session of Congress. Now, I am on the floor and I propose, unless the Senate takes me off my feet, to make a very brief explanation of what this bill is, to let the country see how important it is and who is opposing it and preventing its passage. It ought to have been passed long ago. It is an outrage, sir, that this bill has not been passed. Tuberculosis is the worst disease from which our people suffer, and it is spreading rapidly. We ought to do everything humanly possible to prevent it. I wish to make a short explanation of the bill, and then the Senator can make his objection to its passage, if he so desires. I continue reading from the report of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service:

The total number of deaths for the calendar year 1916 was 1,001,921. Tuberculosis thus caused 10.1 per cent of all deaths. If the same death rate from tuberculosis prevailed in the area of the United States outside of the registration area, the total number of deaths in the entire United States from this disease was approximately 145,000.

Then he goes on in the next paragraph to show the effect of tuberculosis on military man power, and says:

The effect of tuberculosis as a factor in depreciating national man power is well shown in the figures of the physical examination of the draft. Over 5 per cent of all examined, or more than 1 in 20, were found unfit for military duty because of tuberculosis, while many thousands subsequently developed tuberculosis after induction in the military service and were discharged. If we were to apply the figures of the prevalence of tuberculosis found during the physical examinations incident to the selective-service law to the whole population of the draft age, it may be estimated that there are approximately 1,000,000 cases of tuberculosis in the population of the age groups between 21 and 31.

Think of that, Mr. President—over 1,000,000 cases of tuberculosis in this Nation amongst those between 21 and 31 years of age.

With these figures concerning the prevalence of tuberculosis in this country and its prominence as a cause of death in the national mortality statistics, it is no wonder that tuberculosis has been known as the great white plague.

The Surgeon General then proceeds to show that it is clearly a preventable disease. I will not take the time of the Senate to read that portion of his report, but it is known by scientists that tuberculosis can be prevented. There are Members of this Senate who have had tuberculosis and have been cured of it.

Great efforts are being made all over the country to do something to lessen the ravages of tuberculosis. What this bill proposes is to create a division in the Public Health Service devoted especially to the work.

The Surgeon General continues:

Up to the present time all of the activities of the Public Health Service relating to the investigation of the diseases of man are being conducted under the Division of Scientific Research, while cooperative work in the prevention of the interstate spread of disease and its introduction from foreign countries into the United States is carried on by the Division of Domestic and Interstate Quarantine and Division of Foreign and Insular Quarantine, respectively, in the bureau. While of necessity tuberculosis has been considered in the work of these divisions, it has not been practicable because of insufficient funds and facilities to devote the intensive study to this great problem which it has long merited. Tuberculosis is such an important cause of deaths and disability that if a serious effort is made to reduce to proper limits the needless annual toll of thousands of lives because of its ravages, there is imperative need of a division in the Public Health Service which shall devote all of its time, energy, and funds to the solution of this great problem.

Mr. President, the National Tuberculosis Association, whose members have done a great deal to reduce the effects of this awful plague, have been very active in their support of this measure. They believe that it would have a wonderfully good effect. I agree with them. I have looked into it as carefully as I know how. The Surgeon General thinks it would have a good effect. It is quite a serious proposition here to prevent any longer the passage of this essential legislation which has been already held up for several years by similar objections to those now made. Senators, of course, can take their own responsibility for that.

Before closing I wish to say that the second section of the bill proposes to create an advisory council for consultation with the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service relative to the scientific work to be inaugurated by that service. The effect of this section is to increase the number of members on the board and to broaden the scope of its advisory powers, so that instead of giving to the Surgeon General advice solely in matters relating to the conduct of investigations at the Hygienic Laboratory he may have the benefit of their advice and experience with regard to the entire field of the Public Health Service and investigation. There are now eight members of the advisory board of the Hygienic Laboratory. Section 2 provides for repealing that provision, and in lieu of the eight members of the Hygienic Laboratory creates an advisory council of 10 members who will advise the Surgeon General on all health matters; and then the Surgeon General adds:

In view, therefore, of the increased scope of the functions of the Public Health Service since the passage of the law of 1902, and the need, too, for an advisory council with special relation to the problem of tuberculosis, it becomes eminently desirable to increase the functions of the present advisory board of the Hygienic Laboratory so as to cover all public-health investigations undertaken by the service, and to add to its membership, so that all fields of public-health research may be covered. Section 2 provides for an increase in the membership of the advisory board from 8 to 10, and, moreover, by abolishing ex-officio members, gives a wider field of selection, so that all branches of public-health work may be represented on the board. An advisory board organized on these lines should be of the greatest aid to the National Government.

If there be any real desire on the part of the Senate to take this bill up, discuss it thoroughly, and have a clearer understanding of it, I will not urge that it be taken up now; but it was opposed several times during the whole of the last session. I made effort after effort throughout the entire session to get action on this bill, and notify the Senate now that I am going to do my utmost at this session to get it passed. If it is not passed it will not be my fault. It will be the fault of the men who are opposed to having the very best possible scientific effort made by the Federal Government to prevent, or at least to lessen, tuberculosis in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before objecting to the consideration of this bill, I wish to say simply a word or two.

I have no objection to the Government making appropriations for the purpose of assisting in the investigation of tuberculosis. The Senator from Louisiana is no more interested in the subject than I am. The Senator from Louisiana does not know of its ravages, and what it has done to the people of the United States, more than I know it. But, Mr. President, this bill is not simply for the purpose of getting money to make an investigation of tuberculosis. They will never be satisfied until a new division of the Public Health Service is created.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what the bill creates. The Senator is not familiar with the bill. It creates a tuberculosis division.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, I said that.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what we are trying to do now.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it, and that is what I am objecting to.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right. I want you to state the bill correctly, though.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what the Senator is talking about. I simply say——

Mr. RANSDELL. You said we would not be satisfied until we created a division of tuberculosis. I am simply telling you that the bill creates a division of tuberculosis. That is what we are trying to do in this bill. It is not something to come in the future. It is something to come now, if we get the bill passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are we going to take up the bill or are we not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are not. I am simply calling attention to the fact that if this bill becomes a law we will have created here a new division of the Public Health Service, and I will say now that if it becomes a law we will have a great building rented in the District here, we will have hundreds of employees in the District of Columbia, we will have a whole raft of expenses in every conceivable way that a division of the Public Health Service can bring about.

I am not going to discuss the matter any more at this time, Mr. President, but when the proper time comes I wish to call attention to just what it means. I am perfectly willing, as I say, to make a direct appropriation for the Public Health Service for this work, but let the overhead that is directing the investigation of all other diseases direct this in the same way.

I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over. We temporarily passed over Senate bill 2259, for the relief of Edward S. Farrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think it would be wiser to let the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] explain that bill. He knows all the facts in the case and was intrusted by the Military Affairs Committee with the duty of explaining it in the event that the question arose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ARMY NURSE CORPS (FEMALE).

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am in order or not, but I want to ask the reconsideration of the objection made by the Senator from Utah to the taking up of Senate bill 2496. It is a bill authorizing the retirement of the Army Nurse Corps (female). I am quite sure that if the Senator understood the situation he would not object to its passage, or certainly not to its consideration; and, if I am in order, I will devote a little time to an explanation of that bill.

The members of the Army Nurse Corps are to all intents and purposes a part of the Military Establishment of the United States. The Army Nurse Corps is provided for in the national-defense act. The women who form that corps are in effect enlisted into the service. They are subject to military regulations. Their duties are closely allied with military work, as the Senator knows, in the military hospitals, taking care of the sick and wounded soldiers. They are subject to military orders. They have to comply with the disciplinary regulations of the War Department and of their commanding officers. As I understand, they are the only branch of what we ought to call the military service—because they are in the military service—that have not the retirement privilege.

This bill provides that after a woman has been a nurse in the Army Nurse Corps for 20 years—and, mind you, the Senator from Utah will agree with me that they do not enforce an eight-hour day in the hospitals; the women have to work any number of hours in the day that is necessary, and the work is exceedingly hard upon occasions—after a woman has served for 20 years in the Army Nurse Corps, under the provisions of this bill she will be eligible to retirement on three-quarters pay, just as an enlisted man is eligible for retirement under certain provisions of the law which give him that privilege. It is to put the members of the Army Nurse Corps on somewhat the same basis as the enlisted men and officers of the Army; and I think, Mr. President, they deserve it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is this to be followed or preceded by another measure, which provides for giving promotions and official titles to the nurses, making them captains and majors?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, it bears no relation whatsoever to that.

Mr. KING. Because, as I understand, such a bill as that is either in contemplation or it has been incubated in some of the committees here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have heard of such a proposal, but it has no connection whatever with this bill.

Mr. KING. How many regular nurses are there in the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I could not tell the Senator the total number of the Army Nurse Corps. Of course it is much larger to-day than it was before, on account of this war.

Mr. KING. I presume that is so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But it is limited in the national-defense act to a peace-time strength, and the number of nurses who stay in the service for 20 years is comparatively small. They are the ones who rise to positions of comparative responsibility in the military hospitals. As might be supposed, women do not stay in the Army Nurse Corps as long as men stay in the enlisted branch of the Army. Many marry and establish households of their own; but the ones who serve long and faithfully to-day have nothing to look forward to from the Government after their period of active service is over.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, my information was that there was some purpose in view to carry on into the service, so that they would get the benefits of this act, a large number of those who had come into the service quite recently, and that whereas the Army was being demobilized there was no purpose to effectuate any demobilization of the Army Nurse Corps, and there would be hundreds of those in the Army, and if they could not find service in the military branch of the Government they would be loaned out, so to speak, to private hospitals and for private purposes, but still maintain their military status.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They could not maintain their active-service status unless they were on active service with the Army, and the demobilization of the Army Nurse Corps goes on along with the demobilization of the Army; and the Congress is master of that situation, as was illustrated in the first part of July, when it appropriated such a small sum of money for the pay and subsistence of the Army as to compel its demobilization down to the authorized strength of the national-defense act. So I can assure the Senator from Utah that under the policy adopted by Congress the number of Army nurses can not exceed, after September 30 next, the number authorized in the national-defense act, and that of those very, very few will ever serve 20 years. I do not suppose there are over 20 nurses in the Army to-day who have had over 20 years of active service, and I think they are entitled to the Army retirement privilege.

Mr. KING. I shall withdraw my objection, but I still think this legislation is not wise. As an original proposition, I think to have a privileged class getting pensions is a mistake. I should object, if it were an original proposition, to giving retirement to judges, to Army officers, or to any employee of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, of course, the Senator should introduce bills repealing all of the retirement legislation of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. KING. I grant that that would be the work of Sisyphus; it never could be accomplished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that members of the Army Nurse Corps who have had active service therein of 20 years (including for the purpose of computation time of service as contract nurse) shall, upon application therefor to the Secretary of War, be placed upon a retired list, and shall thereafter receive 75 per cent of the pay, exclusive of foreign-service pay, they were drawing at the time they became entitled to retirement as aforesaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate by any extended discussion. I was interested yesterday, in going through the Sunday papers, to find the state of mind of the world with reference to the settlements and adjustments which have thus far been taken care of in the pending treaty.

Read in the light of the treaty now before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, yesterday's Sunday papers were most instructive. If the news items of these papers are correct, almost one-half of the population of the world outside of the Central Powers are now protesting against the settlements and adjustments made in this treaty. I do not include in that the nations with whom we were at war. I refer only to the people who are subject to the domination or control of the allied powers. The papers carried the voice of protest in different ways of millions who were represented in the war upon the side of the Allies. Much of this news was belated, long suppressed, some of it carried to this country by the representatives of the protesting people. But in some form or other this news appeared in yesterday's paper in different ways. The Chinese are in open protest against the treaty. The Koreans, the Egyptians, large portions of the people of India, the people of Ireland, all are asking in some way to be released from the terms of this treaty or objecting to its provisions. In some of these countries open revolution is being carried on. War is already in progress to compel them to submit to the treaty. If you add to all this dissatisfaction the bitter dissatisfaction of Germany and the people of Austria and Hungary, the treaty which we are asked to underwrite and maintain has arrayed against it at this time the sentiment and vehement protest of far more than one-half of the people of the globe. Never was a more perilous situation presented for the consideration of a nation. It is the conviction of some of us that if we do what is here proposed, sorrow and suffering are ahead of the American people. It is a greater load than we can carry, and yet there are those who are hastening to enter this uncharted sea. I would not feel justified in discussing these facts if it were not that as I view it this covenant makes them of prime concern to us. The task of underwriting the treaty itself with reference to the powers against whom we were at war would be a considerable task, but when we find that the peoples who were represented either directly or indirectly, the subject nationalities upon the side of the Allies, constituting nearly one-half the population of the earth, are in protest now before the treaty is ratified, it presents, to my mind, the most serious proposition with which we have had to deal as a practical fact at this time.

There are the Chinese, some 400,000,000, the Koreans, the Egyptians, the people of Ireland, and you may travel through, quoting now simply from memory, the list of subject nationalities, and practically all have in some form registered a protest against present settlements.

Before proceeding briefly to call attention to the situation I read into the RECORD, although they are familiar, of course, to my colleagues, article 10 and article 11, both bearing upon this particular phase of the situation:

ART. 10. The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

That article has been construed to mean a protection of the boundaries of the different nations as they shall exist at the time the treaty is finally ratified. It is supposed to have nothing to do with other than external aggression and the existing political independence. A great deal has been said as to the manner in which it might well be construed to go much further than the mere protection against external attacks, but I leave it with the construction which its supporters place upon it. Coupled with it is article 11:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"Any war or threat of war" includes war of any kind. Can there be any doubt that article 11 covers internal war as well as external war? That is accentuated in view of the fact that the preceding article covers only supposedly external war. But we have article 11, which says:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league.

It includes internal disturbance or internal war or a revolution or any other disturbance which the council would construe to rise to the dignity of a threat of war. Then it says:

And the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

If article 10 were eliminated and article 11 should remain in the league, the principle of article 10 would be as effectually covered by article 11 as it is in article 10. Certainly "any war or threat of war" would cover an external attack as clearly as an internal, and could be as readily applied to it.

It seems to me that the striking out of article 10 and leaving in article 11 accomplishes but little along the line those desire who are opposed to article 10. Suppose article 10 is eliminated, and we will say, simply for the purpose of illustration, because we have to take some nation, that China makes an external attack upon the territory of Japan. It is just as effectually covered by article 11 as it would be by article 10, because it is a threat of war or actual war. It may be war or a threat of war. Therefore when you couple article 10 and article 11 the league is given jurisdiction over every conceivable disturbance which may be interpreted either as war or a threat of war, and it is immaterial whether it is internal or external.

I call particular attention to article 11 in view of the situation as it was developed in yesterday's papers. There is now going on in the allied countries and subject nationalities war and threat of war among nearly one-half the population of the earth.

If the league were completed to-morrow and the situation should be presented as it was presented yesterday by the news items in the papers we would have a matter of concern to us as a member of the league in every quarter of the globe without any exceptions, so far as I was able to decipher from the news items. We would be concerned with the situation in China and Japan, in Korea, in Ireland, in Egypt, in Persia. Throughout the two hemispheres there is that condition of affairs which must necessarily be designated as either war or a threat of war.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the distribution which took place at Versailles was really a distribution of the territory of two hemispheres among three or four nations at most. For instance, Japan, prior to the meeting at Versailles, had acquired Korea, Formosa, large holdings in Manchuria, extended holdings in Mongolia, and by the settlement at Versailles a most vital holding in the very heart of China, to wit, Shantung. That condition of affairs places Japan in practical control of the Eastern Hemisphere. If the Shantung matter is ratified and the policy which I believe to be the policy of Japan is carried out, and I judge that policy by her acts in the past, there can be no doubt the dominating, controlling, and directing influence for the entire Eastern Hemisphere will be the Japanese Imperial Government. At no distant day she will control the millions in that part of the world.

Against that condition of affairs there is now, and there will continue to be, in my judgment, until it is settled by the arbitrament of war, the protest of nearly one-third of the population of the earth.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator contesting the proposition which seems to have been accepted by many statesmen, European as well as American, occidental as well as oriental statesmen, that Japan has a special interest in the Orient, the same as we insist upon having a special interest over the Western Hemisphere? Obviously Japan must have some place in the sun. She can not expand to the East. She is forbidden to go into the Philippines or into Australia or New Zealand. Manifestly her destiny leads her into Asia. There is where we prefer that she should go. Is there anything wrong in Japan being conceded by the statesmen of the world a special interest—and I am not attempting to define the term "special interest"—in the Orient, the same as the Root-Takahira agreement seemed to recognize and the Lansing-Ishii agreement seemed to recognize?

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon, the Root-Takahira agreement particularly avoided recognizing anything of the kind.

Mr. KING. I think the object of it was to effectuate that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. No; I beg the Senator's pardon, the Root-Takahira agreement did not recognize any special interest, and that is the distinction between the Root-Takahira agreement and the Lansing-Ishii agreement. Under the Lansing agreement a special interest was recognized. Let me make my position clear.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask, if the doctrine which seems to be recognized and accepted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], which he so clearly expresses, is to be accepted, what becomes of the doctrine of self-determination and what becomes of the new theory that weak nations are to be protected from the strong, for the Senator seems to go back to the old barbaric principle which we have heard so much denounced, which is that power and strength shall multiply itself and march forward with resistless force and take wherever it wants to take?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to reply to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I do not intend, of course, to divert the Senator from Idaho from the speech which he is making, and I apologize for intruding again, but I do not want my good friend from Missouri to put me in a false attitude, and I know he would not do so intentionally.

I did not mean to express my approval or disapproval, in the interrogation which I propounded, of the Root-Takahira agreement or the Lansing-Ishii agreement. I merely attempted to state that as I understood it the statesmen both of the New and the Old World seem to concede that Japan's future lies in the Orient. I agree in that view, that her future should lie there, and that if she expands and has a place in the sun we prefer the expansion to be in the Orient rather than in the Occident.

But let me say just in conclusion that a recognition of the proposition that Japan shall have or may have or is entitled to have a special interest in the Orient I do not think confutes the idea of the right of self-determination or the right of local self-government or the right of nationality and sovereignty that belongs to all nations. We assert a special interest in the Western Hemisphere, this great Republic of ours. We do not mean by the assertion of that special interest that we are interfering with the sovereignty or the rights or the liberties or the freedom of any peoples upon the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. REED. That is just the difference between American civilization and Japanese barbarism. They do mean to assert, and they are asserting, the right of national robbery and universal theft.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make my position clear with reference to the Japanese situation in the Orient and with reference to the English attitude toward its subject nationalities. I might have a deep concern in all those matters as an observer, but I should refrain from discussing them here upon the floor of the Senate if it were not for the fact that we are called upon to become a party to the transaction by underwriting and maintaining a situation.

Japan is said to have a special interest in China. I would be perfectly willing to have that matter debated between China and Japan and have it settled between themselves under certain conditions until those developments should reach the point where they would become of vital concern to us. But the thing which meets us at the very threshold is that this special interest in China is a thing which the United States is called upon now to maintain and guarantee and perpetuate. So it becomes a matter of vast concern to me whether that special interest is based upon the mere fact of the propinquity of Japan to China or whether it is based upon what I believe it to be the intent of Japan to dominate China.

But, Mr. President, where are you going to stop with your "special interests"? When the Lansing-Ishii agreement was made it was agreed that Japan had special interests in China. That was supposed to be based upon the proposition of geographical propinquity. If that was true it was equally true that China had especial interest in Japan. All maps I have ever seen show that China is just as near to Japan as Japan is to China! We would be under just as much obligation if China should ask us to turn about and agree upon a treaty which would give China a special interest in Japan, which there is no danger in the world of our doing, for the simple reason that Japan would not submit to it for a moment. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has intimated, it is an exhibition of the fact that the Japanese right is based upon her superior military power and not upon justice.

But, as I said, I could pass that by if it were not for the fact that under articles 10 and 11 the United States will be called upon to maintain these special interests, and it will be called upon to maintain them in whatever light Japan construes them. I think the Secretary of State was correct when he said that this "special interest" had relation to nothing more than the mere fact that it was geographically closely related to China. However, there is no doubt but that a different construction is held by Japan, as was stated in the Russian minister's dispatch to his home government after talking to the Japanese authorities, which was to the effect that Japan placed an entirely different construction upon it, and that in case there was a division of sentiment or view in regard to it Japan felt she should have the best opportunity and the greater advantage in enforcing her view.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, please.

So Japan has already construed her special interest to mean paramountcy or political dominancy in the Orient, including a dominancy over 400,000,000 people; and the reason why I am concerned in it is that the United States is now called upon to underwrite and perpetuate it.

I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language in the Lansing-Ishii agreement is "special position," and taken in connection with the Secretary's testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations, where, to my mind at least, he gave a clear indication of the position, it is that Japan's special privileges, whatever they may have been, grow wholly out of her geographical situation in the Far East.

Mr. BORAH. Both phrases, if I recall, "special interest" and "special position," are used in the agreement.

Mr. MOSES. Both terms are employed, but I think the Secretary's argument before the committee was directed to the term "special position."

Mr. BORAH. The two together, if they are both there, have been construed to mean the same thing, to wit, a peculiar and dominant right of Japan in China over that of any other power. But, Mr. President, there was one thing which appeared in yesterday's papers which interested me more than all else, because the condition of Korea and the protest of China and the situation in the Orient have been discussed a great deal, and there was nothing new about it. I am not assuming to state anything new. But in yesterday's papers appeared, about a month and a half belated, news of the fact that one of the subject nations of England at this time is in violent protest, if not open rebellion, against the authority of the English Government.

In 1882 England went into Egypt ostensibly for the purpose of collecting certain debts and stated to the world over and over again through her statesmen then holding office, such men as Mr. Gladstone, that they were in Egypt solely for the purpose of accomplishing certain things, and that after those things were accomplished, to wit, the collection of debts, they would withdraw from Egypt.

That statement has been carried forward from time to time from 1882, or, in other words, during the last 40 years. In 1914 England, under the exigencies of war, as it was claimed, declared a protectorate over Egypt and set up a ruler chosen by the English Government. It was stated at the time that that was merely a step toward the independence of Egypt, and the Egyptian people thoroughly understood, and acted upon the understanding, that they were being protected by a friendly power with a view of giving them their independence, for which they had long been striving.

When the peace commission met at Versailles the Egyptian people undertook to send their representatives to Versailles for the purpose of presenting their cause. They were denied an opportunity to present the facts. They were not only denied an opportunity to present them, but their representatives were interned and practically imprisoned and are practically held, if not actually in restraint, until this time, being refused passports even to come to the United States.

The world paid very little attention to that incident, because a single line covered the entire transaction. We did not know that lying behind that effort of those representatives to have a hearing at Versailles were the protests and uprising of an entire people, uniform in language and in civilization and animated by a true spirit of nationality. Their protest has ripened into actual warfare, and that warfare has been going on from the time of the first notice to the Egyptians that the protectorate was to be made permanent until now. To-day in Egypt those people are being held by force; they are restrained by the bayonet, and bloodshed and carnage prevail throughout that country.

I again state that, while any man would feel deep concern that such revolting things should be going on, I would not discuss them here except for the reason that this is another one of the illustrated conditions which we are to take care of under articles 10 and 11. The Far East is a seething mass of discontent and revolution, including nearly one-third of the earth's population, and we are to underwrite it.

In addition to that there are coming forth now protests of millions of people under the British flag against the authority which we are asked to maintain for Great Britain. Mr. President, the English Government as a result of this war acquired territory almost as large as the United States. Although imperialistic appetites were supposed to have been satisfied by the experiences of the past, when the Versailles conference shall have finished its work and this treaty shall have ripened into actual results, Great Britain will have acquired a territory almost as large as the United States and will have acquired dominion over 33,000,000 people. Of those 33,000,000 additional people over whom they have acquired or will acquire dominancy practically all are to-day in protest against the reign and rule of Great Britain.

I am concerned about these conditions, as I say, by reason of the fact that they can no longer be a matter of distant concern to the United States. When the league covenant is once completed they may be just as vital and just as much our concern as if they arose within our own territory. We may be called to assume the responsibility of settling them in Egypt as we would be in Mexico, or even within our own boundaries.

I call attention, Mr. President, to some of these facts and will ask that others be inserted in the RECORD.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that the information which is now reaching the people of the United States is information, based upon facts, which has been in existence and should have reached the people of the United States weeks and weeks ago; and they reached this country not through the channels of the news agencies but by means of special representatives chosen by the subject nations to bring them to the attention of the people of the United States.

In other words, the people of the United States are being asked to make haste and ratify a treaty while the news agencies, such as Reuter and Havas, are withholding from the people of the United States the facts upon which may depend the lives of hundreds of thousands of our citizens. The Reuter News Agency, the French news agency known as the Havas, has been precluding from the people of the United States that information which goes to the very heart of this problem with which we are dealing; and the facts which are brought here for the consideration of the American people are brought in spite of the action and over the protests, as one might say, of the nations with whom we are asked to form a partnership.

We know that for the last four years carnage, devastation, and decimation have been going on in Korea; there is not an act of German brutality that may not find its counterpart in the treatment of Korea by Japan, and yet, until Christian organizations were able through their agents to bring that news to this country, the American people were informed over and over again through the organized propaganda which was going on that it was a blessing that the Korean people had come under the control of Japan. As a matter of fact, when the real information gets here from authorities which we dare not challenge, instead of it having been a blessing, we find that it is an indescribable curse upon the Korean people that Japan ever placed her control over those helpless people.

The same thing precisely is now taking place with reference to Egypt and the other parts of Europe where the subject nationalities are facing the reign and the rule which we propose to fasten down and make permanent for all time.

ATROCITIES CHARGED AGAINST BRITISH SOLDIERS BY EGYPTIAN PEACE DELEGATION.

CAIRO.

Hundreds killed, wounded, and imprisoned by British soldiers, who swept the streets with machine guns during peaceful demonstrations of protest against deportation of Egyptian independence leaders. Ten-year-old girl assaulted by several soldiers until she died.

CHOBAK.

British soldiers pillaged town, killed 21, wounded 12, mistreated women, buried 5 persons to their waists and cut them to pieces with bayonets, burned 144 of the 200 homes.

EL CHABANAT.

Detachment of English soldiers pillaged village, burned it, and left 4,000 persons without shelter.

AZIZIA AND BEDRECHIEN.

Soldiers searched both villages for arms and burned a number of homes.

CHOUBRA-EL-CHARIEH AND KAFFR-EL-HAGGA.

Alleging that a shot had been fired at an English patrol, soldiers condemned all male inhabitants to be flogged on the stomach and back.

UPPER EGYPT.

British general decreed that every Egyptian, including high dignitaries, must salute British officers in the streets. Those who did not obey the order were dragged before courts-martial.

These were facts which the Egyptian people asked permission to present to the Versailles conference, but, just as Japan prevented the Korean delegates from raising their voices at the Versailles conference to give the world the facts and to inform the people of the United States the kind of partners which they were to have, the English Government denied a hearing to the Egyptian delegates who were to present these facts to the conference.

I read a portion of an affidavit, a copy of which I have in my possssion. This is an affidavit by the son of the mayor of Chobak:

I heard what the soldiers had done with five of the inhabitants, namely, the Sheikh Abdel Ghani Ibrahim Tolba, his brother, Abdel Rehim Ibrahim Tolba, his son, Said Abdel Ghani Tolba, and two others, Khafagi Marzouk and Abdel Samad el Okbi—those were buried alive to their waists, then shot and afterwards disfigured with bayonets. I saw their disfigured corpses as I assisted in getting them out of the places they were buried in. One hundred and forty-four houses were burned, and to our knowledge 21 persons were killed and 12 were wounded, out of whom 1 died. It is very probable that the casualties were more than that, as most of the houses were totally burned to ashes, and it is presumed that many inhabitants were burned within.

Four soldiers attempted to break the door of my neighbor, Gad el Noula Nassan Magata, but they were unable to do so. Then they entered an adjacent house and jumped from it onto a roof and went down to the said house, where they found Gad el Noula and his wife, Wakda Bint el Gabn, who was carrying her child, a year old. The soldiers attempted to assault her, and when her husband protested one of them shot him and he died the next day. She fled into another room, but the soldiers followed and caught her. She thought when she held her child, who was on her shoulders, to the soldiers she might attract their mercy and pity toward her, and thus escape assault, but when she stretched her arms with the child between them the soldiers brutally shot the child and the bullet pierced his right shoulder. He did not die and is still under treatment.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to insert at this point some other facts in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BORAH. I read a paragraph from the petitions which were to have been presented by the representatives of Egypt to the peace conference:

STRIKING POINTS IN EGYPT'S PLEA TO PEACE CONFERENCE FOR INDEPENDENCE.

What the English have done in Egypt has opened between them and us an abyss so deep that it is radically impossible for the Egyptians to accept any longer the domination of the English.

We know the great bulk of the British people consent to what is being done in Egypt only through ignorance of the shameful facts. The truth has been rigorously suppressed.

Is there not reason for us to doubt the triumph of justice when we consider all the obstacles put in our path to prevent our feeble voices from being heard in the world above the powerful voice of England?

If excesses committed against the enemy are reprehensible, what is to be thought of excesses committed against a friendly and allied people? (Referring to alleged British atrocities.)

For the British authorities in Egypt the treaty of London was a "scrap of paper," just like the promises officially made by British statesmen.

The principle of inviolability is not taken into consideration; there is no respect for women and no regard for the life and property of the innocent.

The whole of Egypt rejects the British domination. It will be a crying injustice if the conference sanctions the loss of the autonomy we acquired a hundred years ago. Is it conceivable that the Egyptian people can be treated like ordinary merchandise?

Let us suppose, for the sake of the argument, which I am perfectly willing to do, that the outrages in Korea have been exaggerated; let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that the brutalities in Egypt have been exaggerated; let us assume that the cruelties which are now coming to light have been overcolored; the fact remains that all these people are in utter opposition to the authority and the power which we are called upon to perpetuate and maintain; and it is demonstrative of the fact that these people are not going to be reduced to subjection or to serfdom without a contest which will ripen into war. War is now being waged and it will continue to be waged until an overpowering pressure reduces them to actual subjection.

The thing which I object to is that the United States shall be called in as a partner to help furnish that overpowering pressure. I object to forming a partnership with any nation or combination of nations which have not constructed their civilization and their government upon principles in harmony with the principles of this Republic. If, as conditions now exist, we are to form partnerships with these nations, we are simply taking upon ourselves the burden of oppression which has characterized our partners before the partnership was formed.

There are three points to which I therefore direct attention to-day: First, the persistent, the constant, the never-ending efforts of the news agencies of England and France to keep the facts from the American people; second, that while the facts are being concealed and ignorance prevails as to conditions in those countries, we are being whipped and lashed to conclude the treaty before the facts are known; and, third, that when we enter into this partnership we then become, under articles 10 and 11, obligated to perform the never-ending duty of keeping those people in a condition against which they are at this time protesting. It is a fearful task, a task fraught with all kinds of trouble for our people, a task at war with all our professions, principles, and ideals. Why hasten? Let us know all and everything there is to be known before we take on this stupendous burden. Let us, if we are to assume the burden, do so in the full knowledge of its great weight.

I here insert in the RECORD certain statements or affidavits:

Sworn statement of Abdel Latif Abou el Magd, age 25 years, a farmer and son of the omda (mayor) of the village of Shobak, Province of Giza:

"On Sunday, March 30, 1919, a policeman came to our village with a message from the mulahez (police officer) of Mazghouna, Sawi Effendi El Taher, informing my father of the expected arrival of a train conveying British soldiers to repair the railway line. He, the policeman, instructed us to send out 30 men to help in carrying out the repairs; moreover, he drew our attention to the necessity of giving every assistance to the expected forces. The mayor then did his best in collecting the required laborers, and, together with the sheikh and the chief guard, he advised all the inhabitants to welcome the forthcoming soldiers and to treat them well, in order to avoid the unpleasant consequences. Further, a day before all the mayors of the villages of the neighborhood had received instructions from the mulahez to welcome the British soldiers in order to avoid any misunderstanding. Our mayor communicated these instructions to all of us, and we on our part, knowing of what had happened in Azzazia and Badrahein, resolved to resort to absolute tranquillity.

"The train arrived at 4 p. m. and stopped at a distance south of the village. The soldiers came down and were received by the mayor, the sheikh, the chief guard, the guards, and myself. We noticed that they meant to enter the village, and we feared the bad results of their so doing. The mayor, therefore, tried to convince them not to enter the village, but in vain. None of them or with them could understand what the mayor was saying. They entered the village and installed themselves all over. They took all the geese, the fowls, pigeons, lambs, etc., that they came across. I saw some of them surrounding a woman named Aziza Bint Khodeir, wife of Abdel Tawab Abdel Maksoud, shamefully touching every part of her body and trying to violate her. She cried for her husband's help. He ran out from the house with a stick in his hand and gave the soldier who caught his wife a blow on the head. Another soldier then fired at him and killed him on the spot. Murmurs of rage and discontent filled the air, specially for defaming the honor of such women as Aziza and others, of whom I heard but not seen. The soldiers then began to attack the houses, killing the inhabitants, plundering everything that came under their sight, burning the buildings, animals, and people, and shooting everybody who came in their way. My father and I took shelter in our house till the morning. Throughout the whole night the soldiers were trying to open or break through our door in vain. Next day, at about 8 a. m., the mulahez came to our house and shouted to my father to get out. My father then opened the door, and the mulahez, together with 10 British soldiers, entered our house and searched every corner of it to see whether there were arms, but they found none. They did not take anything at all from the house, but took my father along with them, and the mulahez ordered me to shut the door after him, which I did. Half an hour later some soldiers, about 10 in number, climbed our neighbor's house and jumped into ours. I therefore took my younger brother, aged 16, to a room, wherein we shut ourselves. The soldiers broke its door to pieces and ordered us to get out, threatening us with their rifles. They put one of them on our guard and the rest entered all the rooms of the house, breaking open our boxes and cupboards and taking away all that they found, such as jewelry and clothes. One of the soldiers cut off my robe with his bayonet and took my bank-note case, which contained £150 in bank notes, and some jewelry, estimated at £200. Fortunately our ladies were absent that night in a neighboring village. The soldiers on their going out set fire to the carpets of our waiting room. As regards my father, I heard that he had been seen at El Ayat and then at El Wasta, but nothing certain is known about him. I heard what the soldiers had done with five of the inhabitants, namely, the sheikh, Abdel Ghani Ibhahim Tolba; his brother, Abdel Rehim Ibrahim Tolba; his son, Said Abdel Ghani Tolba; and two others, Khafagi Marzouk and Abdel Samad et Okbi. Those were all buried alive to their waists, then shot, and afterwards disfigured with bayonets. I saw their disfigured corpses as I assisted in getting them out of the places they were buried in. A good number of animals were killed, among which we lost a buffalo and a camel. One hundred and forty-four houses out of 210 were burnt, and to our knowledge 21 persons were killed and 12 were wounded, out of whom 1 died. It is very probable that the casualties were more than what had been discovered, as most of the houses were totally burnt to ashes, and it is presumed that many inhabitants were burnt within. The survivors at present leave the village by night and return to it by day.

"Q. Were the soldiers armed when they first left the train, or did some of them return to the train to get their arms?—A. Some of them were armed and some were not. But when the firing of those soldiers in the village was heard the train moved nearer the village and stopped at about 30 meters from it, and the machine guns were then put in action. Fortunately the inhabitants fled to the fields and the losses did not therefore exceed the number above mentioned."

Later, the Omda's son requested to add to his original evidence the following:

"My father, the Omda, was taken to a place unknown to us. The sheikh was half buried alive and shot. The chief guard was also killed in his house and the three guards fled. The village is now left without any responsible person in charge. We therefore solicit the Government to protect us against further attacks on our persons, honor, and property and also the remaining small part of our poor village. We came some days ago to the Mudira and complained to the Mudir and to the members of our provincial council, who had a meeting held and examined our complaint. But till now we did not see any steps taken in connection with our grievances about the atrocious actions committed by the British soldiers in our village. Moreover, I still do not know whereto my father has been taken."

His statement ended, he affirmed and signed.

To the members of the legislative assembly and members of the provincial council of Giza:

I, the undersigned, Ibrahim Rashdan, mayor of Azizia, have the honor to submit the following to your notice:

On Tuesday, 25th March, 1919, at 4 a. m., I was awakened by 10 British Army soldiers knocking at my door under the command of two officers, who had revolvers in their hands.

They were accompanied by an Egyptian corporal, a soldier, and an interpreter.

The interpreter told me to give over my weapons and to collect all arms in the village within the space of a quarter of an hour.

I surrendered my revolver, and no sooner had I done so than the soldiers rushed into my bedroom, where my wife and the three children were terribly frightened. The officers and men broke open a wardrobe and jewelry box and took the contents, as well as a wallet containing £50. They subjected my wife and the children to brutal, insulting treatment, even snatching my oldest child's (8 years) earrings with such violence as to wound the ear.

They then went to another wing of the house, where my sons' families lived, and meted out the same treatment to them, the officers looking on and even taking part, with astounding coolness, notwithstanding the pleading of the women and children. They found a safe in my son's apartments and they threatened to kill me if I did not instantly open it; they found 950 sovereigns and my wife's and sons' wives' jewelry, which they took.

They then ordered me to direct them to the homes of the neighboring sheikhs. These homes and those of other inhabitants which looked prosperous were subjected to the same treatment as mine, with varying degrees of violence.

The interpreter informed the people that the British were going to burn the village and ordered the inhabitants to evacuate as soon as possible. Men, women, and children hurried away, carrying what they could.

The village was surrounded by soldiers, who took everything from these unfortunates while leaving the village. They subjected the women to the most brutal treatment; but the fellaheen (peasants) hide these details for the sake of their women's reputation. Cases of rape have been signalled.

From a neighboring sheikh's house I saw the flame rising from my roof, and I learnt that the troops had set fire to it. Every quarter of the village met with the same fate. A sacred banner embroidered with the Moslem formula of faith was desecrated. All the sheikhs were arrested and brought to where I was. The assistant sheikh ghafir (head night watchman) was also arrested, his house plundered, and his wife grossly insulted.

A procession was formed to proceed to Hawamdieh, and whenever the troops found our pace too slow (we were mostly elderly men) they urged us on with the points of their bayonets. We were not allowed to ride, and, as the sun had by now reached its zenith, our sufferings were terrible, and one soldier took pleasure in photographing us in this pitiful condition.

We arrived at Hawamdieh police station about noon, and there found the mayor of Bedreshin and one of his sheikhs. They informed us the terrible treatment which their village and inhabitants had received. We remained for some time under the burning sun with dust blowing, facing the British cannon and surrounded by armed troops.

We were all taken to an inn belonging to the sugar factory, where we found 30 officers and a president. Abdul Medjid Effendi Tharwat, the mulahez (police officer with rank of lieutenant), brought us before them. The senior officer spoke and said, "I am about to inform you of the crime with which you are charged. Azizia is guilty in so much as a British officer has been beaten by some of its inhabitants. This officer was on his way to the Pyramids of Saccara, whither he was bound with other officers; and the joint crime of both villages is, as I learnt at Cairo, the participation of the inhabitants in the burning of the Hawamdieh and Bedreshin railway stations."

I told the officer that I, with my family, the mulahez mustafa effendi, and the people of the village, were guarding the factory during the recent outbreak. I was risking my life in this task. The mulahez by whose side I was standing was wounded by a bullet. I also told the officer that he could make inquiries through the district governor, the manager, and the employees of the factory; but the senior officer would not accept my statement. In truth, these two villages took no part in the destruction of the railway lines, and as far as could be ascertained this destruction was the work of strangers. The burning of the stations of Giza took place several days before the proclamation of the general commanding officer. From our village I can assure that no one molested an officer.

The senior officer then ordered us to collect all arms in the village or he would burn it, and we should share the same fate. He furthermore informed us that henceforth disobedience meant capital punishment. He wrote the following in English and ordered the mulahez to translate in Arabic, and which read: "We, the omdehs and sheikhs of Azizia and Bedreshin, express our regret at the destruction of railways and the attack made on the soldiers of the British Empire, and we admit that the fate which befell our villages is just and proper, and we are prepared to offer any number of men necessary, and refusal will mean court-martial."

The mulahez assured us that if we did not comply and sign this document we should be instantly shot; and we realized that from previous atrocities we had witnessed this would be our fate. As we were in front of the guns and surrounded by armed troops, we signed. The mulahez assured us that he was forcibly obliged also to attach his signature to this document.

We then started for the mudiriah of Giza (provincial governor), where we entered a verbal complaint to his excellency the mudir. From there we went to Cairo and complained to the mustachar (the English adviser to the ministry.)

The next day the mamour el dabt (head officer for public security) took our evidence officially in his report of investigation. He interrogated the Egyptian corporal who accompanied the forces which attacked Azizia and his evidence corroborated mine. He furthermore stated that he had seen British soldiers with the jewelry and who were offering it to the passers-by for sale.

On returning to my home village I found about 180 houses burned and most of the inhabitants left. I found my sister grievously ill as result of the torture she had undergone. All that remained of my home was a few burned mats. I then took my family away to different distant villages.

It is impossible for me to recount all the atrocities and chain of horrors from which unfortunate Azizia suffered, but I will mention the case of the Chafir Abdulla Mahammed, whose house the soldiers entered, took the little money there was and also his wife's jewelry. They undressed his wife and touched her indecently, and in spite of her cries for mercy they beat her with the butts of their rifles. They finished by setting fire to the house.

The Chafir Mahmoud Abdel Aal stated that 10 soldiers took away his rifle, ransacked his house, took all the money and his wife's jewelry. His wife had luckily run away and hid in the cornfields, otherwise she would have been grossly insulted, as were all other women who passed through the British soldiers' hands. His house was completely burned down; they gave him back his rifle, but, adding insult to injury, they tied some dead fowl to it and made him carry it thus to the police station.

I have been an eye-witness to what has been done to the homes of the sheikhs and other inhabitants. They entered the house of Sheikha Mahmoud Okby (I was with them under guard), took his money and all jewelry they could set hands on; the sheikh valued all at about £500. They burned his, his wife's, and the children's clothing, and they are at present wearing borrowed garments. He was then arrested and with me taken to Hawamdieh.

I am suffering from nervous shock in consequence of the treatment to which I was subjected and am extremely weak. I am now staying at Cairo, after having sent my resignation to the mudira.

REPORT OF THE MAYOR OF GIZA.

On Sunday evening, the 30th of March, 1919, an armed train arrived in the village of Eli Chobak, carrying British soldiers in charge of repairing the railway lines. Immediately on leaving the train the soldiers commenced seizing fowl, sheep, and other property of the inhabitants. Nobody opposed them. Afterwards they began to grossly insult the women. One woman, whose husband tried to protect her from their revolting behavior, had a quarrel with them. For this they encircled the village and set fire to it on every side. Those who tried to escape from the conflagration were shot. The soldiers then invited the sheikh and four notables of the villages to follow and explain to the commander of the train.

These men were then strangled and buried upright and their heads were covered over by grass. This carnage and burning was continued from Sunday at 3 o'clock p. m. until next morning at 10 a. m. They then drove the inhabitants to the armed train; the mayor was among the number.

The mulahez (police officer) came to intercede in favor of the women. He entered the village and was struck by the cries of a woman, who implored him to help her. He perceived three British soldiers violating her. He stated that the number of killed was 31, the wounded 12; 144 houses were burned. The number of dead animals was 55, besides a large number of stolen ones.

These acts are certainly not of a nature to give satisfaction to humanity nor to civilized peoples. We transmit the lamentations of our widows, orphans, the old, and infirm to every heart which contains a sentiment of pity. We, the inhabitants of the village of Chobak, cry to the world against the atrocious crimes of which we have been victims.

If there is no one to render us justice and to protect us, if this reign of terror continues, we shall be obliged to leave Egypt, which is becoming a center of anarchy from which no power can protect the innocent from their oppressors. We shall trust in God alone.

(Follows 20 signatures, with stamps, of the villagers.)

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

During the delivery of Mr. BORAH'S speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Idaho will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. BORAH'S speech,

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, some time during the latter part of December last I addressed the Senate, and amongst other things called attention to the severe sentences that were being pronounced by courts-martial both here and in France; and, to illustrate the points I was desiring to make, I cited a number of individual cases where extreme sentences had been passed upon young men in the Army of the United States for very slight offenses. I believe it was the first time that public attention was drawn to these severe sentences, and it seems to have opened up a veritable Pandora's box. The exposure led to an investigation by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate of the convictions under courts-martial here and in Europe, and hearings were had in February, 1919, at which Gen. Ansell, who was Acting Judge Advocate General, and a number of other witnesses were called in reference to the whole subject.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake at this time to enter into a lengthy discussion of the matter. I intend to do that a little later. The testimony at the hearings showed that there was a difference of opinion between the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Crowder, and the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Ansell, as to the power of the Judge Advocate General over these records of conviction, and these differences were very marked, the Judge Advocate General taking one view of his power under the law to revise or modify or reverse the sentences of court-martial, claiming that where the court had jurisdiction and its judgment is once approved by the proper commander, however erroneous it might be by reason of flaw in the proceedings, there is no power of correction in the Judge Advocate General or elsewhere, and that the Judge Advocate General had no further power than an advisory one, looking to mere clemency, based on the illegality of the proceedings, while the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Ansell, claimed that under section 1199 of the Revised Statutes the Judge Advocate General had the power to "revise" these sentences. This latter, it seems to me, is the sensible view. The War Department sustained the contention of Gen. Crowder. It is around these conflicting views that the war on the subject has waged for some time.

In the course of the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee—I then had the honor of being chairman of that committee—I requested Gen. Ansell, on behalf of the committee, to prepare a bill which would so amend the Articles of War as to give the power to some tribunal to revise or to modify or to reverse the sentences of courts-martial. That bill has been prepared, was introduced in the Senate by me, and is now before a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee, and hearings are being had upon it.

I do not intend to address myself to that measure at this time, but shall do so later, when I hope to be able to cover the whole subject. But, Mr. President, I feel it proper to say here and now that the War Department has been entirely unfair to anyone who has undertaken to present a view which differs from the view of the Judge Advocate General. That department has in most unusual ways put its whole power behind an effort to sustain the present military court-martial system and the Articles of War. I feel that the methods which have been pursued are wrong. I have since the war began felt that the system and its enforcement were inherently wrong for this enlightened day and generation and that a modification of it ought to be made, although I insist that the Judge Advocate General had the power, if he had seen fit to exercise it, without any additional legislation, to modify or to revise sentences of courts-martial, notwithstanding his present opinion to the contrary.

Mr. President, Gen. Crowder rendered the country a most distinguished service in the matter of the selective-service law and the efforts which he made to put it into effect, and I commend the work he did, and the country has commended it, but in that law as originally prepared the hand of the military autocrat was in evidence, and the committees of the House and Senate gave to it its touch with the civil population of the country; and while Gen. Crowder is entitled to credit for its enforcement, he is not entitled to any credit for having deprived the original measure of its Prussian tendency and spirit. He is at heart a military autocrat. To him the enlisted man is a mere pawn upon the chess board.

Mr. President, I have had many conferences with Gen. Crowder during the period of this war, and I have told him and other men connected with the Military Establishment more than once that he and they did not get the civilian viewpoint of matters which affect the nonmilitary population. Now, when anyone dares indulge in criticism of this system of military justice—or shall I say injustice—Gen. Crowder shows the same Prussian bent of mind. I dared criticize and drew upon my innocent head his unreasoning wrath. A short while ago I happened to pass him engaged in conversation with a distinguished member of the Military Affairs Committee of the House. The latter stepped up and greeted me cordially. The former did not even turn in acknowledgment of an introduction to me, thus proving both his entire lack of good manners and his resentment of criticism of what he stood for. I stated then, at the suggested introduction, that although I knew the gentleman, he did not seem to know me, and that I had no regrets over the incident. Nor had I. It simply illustrated—and I tell of the incident for that purpose—the character of the man who might, if he had seen fit, have alleviated the suffering and humiliation that fell to the lot of thousands of American boys. He brooks no criticism. He allows no differences with him. He must be supreme.

This incident is not going to deter me from following the path that I had mapped out a good while ago, and that is to get to the bottom of and, if possible, cure this vicious military system. Some time ago, Mr. President, I showed from authentic sources that there have been more than 322,000 trials by inferior courts in the Army since this war began and up to the armistice and over 22,000 general court-martial trials for the same period, and that the average general court-martial sentence of confinement alone, including the most trivial offenses, reaches a period of seven years. This, of course, excludes sentences of life imprisonment and death. I shall call attention to some of those cases later in the session and before I get through with the discussion of the subject to show how unjust they are. Although the system is perfect, as is claimed by the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, although according to them there are no injustices in the system, although they have undertaken to assure the parents of the young men of the Army that everything was all right, yet some 4,000 of these court-martial sentences have been reduced by a board created by the Secretary of War from an aggregate of 28,000 years to a present aggregate of something like 6,700 years! There is still room for improvement, Mr. President; and what is even worse than all these sentences is the fact that after they have been imposed the most shameful brutality has been practiced against military prisoners, no matter how splendid their records may have been nor how slight their breaches of discipline.

All this is preliminary to this proposition: After these hearings began and the gentlemen who were responsible for these unjust sentences began to sit up and take notice of the conditions, after the lid had been lifted, and the people were beginning to give some attention to conditions, the War Department immediately rushed to the defense of the system. The Judge Advocate General prepared a letter for the Secretary of War some time in March, and the Secretary of War signed it. It was largely devoted to upholding the system, showing that there were no injustices in it and it apotheosized the Judge Advocate General. Then the Judge Advocate General proceeded to reply to that letter in order to show further that there were no injustices in the system. Then under Col. Wigmore, of the Judge Advocate General's department, the subject was still further pursued. The gentleman was a colonel in the office of the Judge Advocate General. He was placed at the head of the propaganda system, and he enlarged upon the defense which the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General had made, and there were franked out under his supervision over 70,000 of these so-called justifications and defenses of the court-martial system.

Mr. President, when these letters of the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General, and Col. Wigmore were given to the public I appealed to the Secretary of War, who was absent at the time inspecting the cantonments and camps of the country, that Gen. Ansell's view of the system might be presented at the same time to the public. That request was declined. Gen. Ansell's mouth was closed, and he was demoted and practically driven out of the service because he dared to attack this pernicious and vicious system as it was practiced in the Army. He is out of the Army now, Mr. President, and he is permitted to speak. Although he remained in the service for four or five months after he had made his statement before the Senate Military Committee and developed the true state of affairs with respect to court-martial injustices, and was thereafter placed at the head of a clemency board, the War Department has not dared to proceed against him under the very arbitrary system which in season and out of season he has denounced.

I have had a number of conferences with Gen. Ansell, and I recently asked him to address me a letter, answering a number of questions I put to him, and giving me his views of the whole subject of the court-martial system and the attitude of the War Department to it. He has complied with my request, and I ask unanimous consent to print the letter in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the letter without reading? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MILITARY JUSTICE.

RIGGS BUILDING,
Washington, August 16, 1919.

HON. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SENATOR: At a recent interview you referred to the defense made by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Secretary of War on "Military Justice During this War," as contained in the document so entitled, consisting of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General, and of a letter from the Judge Advocate General in reply, published and distributed throughout the country at public expense as official business.

You expressed yourself at the time as of the opinion that the presentation made by these public officials was not helpful to the true interests of the public or of the Army. I said to you then that that presentation could be shown to be of such character that it could but misinform and mislead the public mind. I shall endeavor to show you now that such is its real character.

In the very beginning we are made to see that

THE SECRETARY OF WAR BLINDLY SUPPORTS THE EXISTING SYSTEM.

Military justice is a subject in which the people should have deepest interest and the Secretary of War keenest concern. It involves in a very direct way our national safety. It affects the morale of our soldiery, and influences the attitude of our people toward military service. Like all matters of justice, it should be the object of sustained solicitude upon the part of the people and a highly sensitive regard upon the part of their officials who have immediately to do with its administration. Thereby alone may imperfections in justice be seasonably revealed and remedial action taken. Hardly could it be denied that the maintenance of justice in the Army requires that the Secretary of War be receptive to all complaints of injustice to our soldiery, alert to discover imperfections in the system of its administration, quick to take or recommend the amplest remedies. Throughout the war his attitude has been the very opposite.

At the beginning of the war, in the actual absence of Gen. Crowder, who had been appointed Provost Marshal General, I, by virtue of seniority, came to be the acting head of the office of the Judge Advocate General, which includes the Bureau of Military Justice, just when the mobilization of the National Army began. The instances of palpable and unquestioned injustice through courts-martial soon became so numerous, so gross, and of such a tendency to aggravation as to seem to me to call imperatively for legal check. More than ever before it was becoming apparent to me, and to my office associates as well, that we could not apply the existing system of military justice to the new Army, as it had been applied to the old, without doing great injustice to the soldiery. Some of the gravest deficiencies of our system, as applied to the old Regular Army, became perfectly apparent. It was more clearly revealed than ever before that that system belonged to other institutions and to another age. It is one in which military justice is to be achieved, as it was achieved in England and on the Continent 150 or more years ago, through the arbitrary power of military command rather than through the application of principles of law; a system governed by man—and a military commander at that—instead of by law. Designed to govern a medieval army of mercenaries, it is utterly unsuited to a national army composed of our citizens called to the performance of the highest duty of citizenship. Designed to govern military serfs obligated by personal fealty and impelled by fear, it is utterly unsuited to American freemen serving the State as soldiers, acting under the impulse and inspiration of patriotism. All this was borne in upon us and impelled us to contemplate remedial methods. It is regrettable that it should not have been seen and appreciated by our professional officers charged with the making of this new Army, whom, unfortunately, the department insisted upon chaining to the medieval system under which they had been trained.

Confronted immediately by a case of shocking injustice, conceded to be such by the department, and still conceded to be such by the Judge Advocate General in his defense (p. 50), in which eight or ten old and experienced noncommissioned officers of the Army had been arbitrarily and unlawfully charged with and tried and convicted of mutiny, we in the office of the Judge Advocate General set to work to reexamine our authority to review the judgment of a court-martial for errors of law, with a view to setting this judgment aside by reason of its illegality. In a unanimous opinion, having for the moment the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General himself, we found this power conferred by section 1199, Revised Statutes, which in terms enjoins the Judge Advocate General of the Army to "revise" the proceedings of courts-martial, a Civil War statute designed, in our judgment, for the very purpose. We conceived that this power of revision of the judgments of courts-martial would largely answer the necessity for the legal supervision of the procedure and judgments of courts-martial, for the establishment of legal principles and appreciations in the administration of military justice, and for giving legal guidance to the power of military command over such judicial functions. That necessity was thus early apparent to the office of the Judge Advocate General, the office that was in daily contact with the administration of military justice and charged with such legal supervision over it as War Department administration would permit; but it was not apparent to the military officials of the War Department insistent upon the view that a military commander must be absolute and unrestrained by law. In control of the Secretary of War, they, led by the Judge Advocate General, who had been induced to change his views, won and had their way throughout the war. The old system, applied without legal restraint, was maintained in its full flower throughout the war. The commanding officer was to have full and final power beyond all review. Thereafter the best we could do was to appeal to the natural sense of justice of those who wielded the power of military command.

Throughout the war, upon every proper occasion, I strove with all the power within me, with such reason, argument, and persuasion as I could command, first, to establish legal regulation of the power of military command in its relation to the administration of military justice, and, when I had failed in that, to induce military authority of its own accord to act justly. The records of the War Department will show that this was my insistent attitude throughout, an attitude with which the department disagreed consistently, except when coerced by expediency into the adoption of some administrative palliative. The department would not stand for the legal supervision of court-martial procedure, but insisted that it should be controlled from beginning to end, and finally, by the power of military command. Surely beyond departmental circles and departmental influence, fair-minded men who know aught of this subject know that the administration of military justice during this war has resulted in injustice, tyranny, and terrorization. The evidence is on every hand. Tens of thousands of our men have been unjustly tried and unjustly punished by courts-martial, and large numbers of them, not tried, have been arbitrarily placed in prison pens and subjected therein to barbarous cruelty, physical violence, and torture. If there be those not willing yet to concede so much, they will be overwhelmed by evidence later on. With our system of military justice as it was considered and decided upon by the Secretary of War and the military authorites the results could not have been otherwise. Those who are responsible for that decision, namely, the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Acting Chief of Staff, and the Inspector General of the Army, must assume the responsibility for the gross injustice done.

Such injustices can not be concealed, however, even during war. Members of Congress became apprised of them from many sources. They became, and properly they ought to have become, a matter of congressional consideration. Bills were introduced for their correction. You were the leader in this remedial movement. In the middle of February last I was summoned before the Senate Military Committee, of which you then were the chairman, and, without having had any previous conference with you upon the subject, to testify out of my experience as Acting Judge Advocate General during the war, and I did testify to the effect that our existing system and the administration of it had resulted in the most cruel injustices. I should have been false to my duty and to my oath had I done otherwise. There had been outcries against the system while war was flagrant. Complaints were everywhere to be heard by all who had not closed their ears. To the extent of my ability I lost no opportunity to acquaint both the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army with them. But the Secretary, as many another stronger man has done, exhibited unusual strength in adhering to his original commitment.

WAR DEPARTMENT METHODS OF DEFENSE.

The matter was now before the public, and the department had to act. The Secretary immediately set about not to inquire, not to investigate, but to make a defense. Therein he was guided, as upon this subject he has ever been guided, by his Judge Advocate General. They appreciated and acknowledged that they were responsible for the injustice, if injustice there had been. They denied that there had been any injustice, and prepared to support and make plausible that denial. Within 10 days after I had testified before the Senate Military Committee the Judge Advocate General and the chief exponent of his view had a conference with the Secretary of War, at which they formulated a plan for the defense of the existing system and their administration under it. The system was to be maintained at all costs. The authority of the department was to be used to reassure the people as to the merits of the existing system, to deny or condone its results, and to destroy the force of all criticism or condemnation of it. Power of government was to be liberally used to this end. Bureaus of the department were set to work to prepare a defense, public funds generously used, and a campaign of propaganda initiated. Officers of high rank, under Col. John H. Wigmore, in charge, and an adequate clerical force were assigned to the task. Much since then has been said and done in the execution of the plan. The methods employed were such as when employed in private affairs habitually receive the condemnation of honest men and discredit any cause; public funds have been improperly used; official favors have been lavishly bestowed upon those in the office of the Judge Advocate General who would actively support the system, and official power has been used to suppress, discredit, menace, demote, and discipline those who oppose it; clemency boards have been "packed" with friends of the system, and simplest mercy denied in order to vindicate the system and those involved in its defense.

Speaking now to the document under discussion: First, the chief of the propaganda section prepared for the signature of the Secretary of War the letter standing first in the document discussed, in which the Secretary of War was made to convey to the Judge Advocate General an assurance of his entire faith in the system and of his confidence in the Judge Advocate General, and to declare that injustice had not been done during this war. And especially did he call upon the Judge Advocate General to prepare for publication a statement, to the end that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject. The chief propagandist then prepared a responsive statement for the signature of the Judge Advocate General, under date of March 8, which consisted of a general defense of the system and largely of a personal attack upon me. The Secretary of War gave this statement to the press, having arranged in the meantime for the fullest publicity. With all possible patience I prepared a statement pointing out the deficiencies of the system and my own attitude toward it, and asked the Secretary of War to give my communication the same publicity he had given his and that of the Judge Advocate General. This he declined to do, though this communication of mine afterwards appeared in the New York Times, but without any knowledge or connivance upon my part. In that communication I pointed out conduct upon the part of the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General in their relation to this subject that was clearly inconsistent with official or personal integrity, notwithstanding which both have ever since kept silent and taken no action, although I remained in the Army for nearly four months thereafter in order that I might continue amenable to such disciplinary action as they might choose to take. However, there was not one word in the communication that I had not previously spoken to the Secretary of War in person, and without denial from him, on the last night of February last.

Not content with this first statement which was given to the press, the chief of the propaganda section prepared the far more comprehensive defense contained in the letter signed by the Judge Advocate General in the document under discussion, between seventy and one hundred thousand copies of which were published and distributed to the lawyers and others throughout the country at public expense. The circumstances attending the publication of this document, when contrasted with contemporaneous representations of the Secretary of War, will mildly illustrate the character of the official methods employed throughout this controversy. This communication, though bearing date of March 10, was not authorized by the Secretary of War until March 26, and was not given to the public until April 9. In the meantime, on April 5, the Secretary of War had assured me in writing that he deprecated the public controversy and that it ought to stop on both sides, and cordially invited my cooperation in remedying the existing system. This assurance I accepted in good faith, only to find four days later this comprehensive publication launched against me and sent broadcast throughout the country.

An artful incident of the common authorship of the three communications is to be found in the fact that the author has the Secretary, in his letter of March 1, give strong and unqualified approval to the system of military justice and its results. But after reflection he has the Judge Advocate General, in his defense, concede many deficiencies and admit much injustice. He might also have taken the Secretary from such an exposed position. This letter, or defense, of the Judge Advocate General is designed to be the last word, the final avouchment, upon the subject, the complete vindication of the system, its supporters, and the department, and to bring about the utter discomfiture of those who have criticized the existing system and have sought and are still seeking a better one.

The system can scarcely be stronger than this skillful representation of it would have it appear. If this representation is weak, the system may be presumed to be weaker still. I would have you first look into the strength of that representation for the moment, not as though it were factitious, but regarding it as of face value and indulging the presumption that it is an expression honestly arrived at and honestly entertained.

THE SECRETARY'S LETTER.

Please look at it. It is from the highest authority, from the chief guardian of the soldier's rights, who should have been watchful for any weaknesses in the system and sympathetic for all who suffered by them. It was his supreme duty to discover its deficiencies and to exert his power for progress and improvement. His letter, saved of its inconsistencies, consists entirely of prejudgment and expressions of satisfaction. This was his state of mind toward the code and the criticism made of it, and he would so express himself without making the slightest investigation. In his letter he first affects surprise at the complaints and resolutely expresses the "firmest determination that justice shall be done." But at once he says he does not believe the complaints and is convinced that injustice has not been done. He arrives at this conviction, he confesses, through the confidence he has in his Judge Advocate General and the faith that he has in the system. Then, observing that, though entirely satisfied himself, "it is highly important that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject," he directs the Judge Advocate General to prepare a statement for that purpose. He does not withhold judgment upon the specific complaints and have them investigated; he does not direct an inquiry; he resents the complaints, sees in them an attack upon "the department and its representatives, who have not been in a position to make any public defense or explanation and have refrained from doing so." His proclaimed purpose is not to determine the facts, but to assume them to be what he wants to believe them to be, and he calls for a statement, based upon that assumption, in order "to reassure the families of all these young men who had a place in our magnificent Army." You can understand his predicament, the necessity for loud asseveration to impress public opinion by assuring it and himself that all was well. It was necessary that he continue to repeat the unreasoned assertions that led to his commitment to the system in the early days of the war. Having committed himself to the views of those intent upon maintaining that system, it was necessary that ever afterwards he soothe his conscience by closing his ears to the cries of justice. Never thereafter would he hear me, an officer of rank, experience, and some repute, with a responsibility that placed me in immediate contact with the unjust results of that system. Holding their hands, he had taken the plunge, and to them he must look for safety. They told him that the department as a matter of law did not have, and as a matter of policy ought not to have, general supervisory power over courts-martial in questions of law, but that the views of the commander in the field should be final. When he denied the department that supervisory power he shut his eyes to his responsibility, he denied himself the opportunity to keep in touch with the administration of justice in the Army, and, relying upon a mere convention which had no basis in law, he turned his back upon the demands of justice and screened himself from its sufferings. He stands or falls with the system.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEFENSE.

His defense consists of blind professions of faith in the system, unreasonable assertions of its excellence, and a sympathetic appeal that they be believed in even as you would believe in him. It does him less than justice; it would have you believe that sheer cruelty of the system made him happier than Caligula's minion, whereas he is only blind to its cruelty. The statement does reveal his immovable mental attitude upon the subject, which was not to be unexpected. Trained to the line of the Army and not to the law, finding the work of his own department uncongenial, ever ambitious for a line command, orthodox in every military appreciation, he has, throughout his long years of service, taken not the judicial but the professional soldier's "rough-and-ready justice" point of view. He regards the system as so organically perfect and vital to military efficiency that even its form is to be touched only lightly. His mind has repelled all criticism of the system and is incapable of contemplating that it might be fundamentally and structurally wrong. This fixed mental attitude obtrudes throughout the statement. So addicted to regard the system with blind veneration he can never perceive its wretched incongruity as an American institution. He refers to his "firm belief in the merits and high standards of our system of military law." He asserts his vital interest "in vindicating the honor of the Army and War Department as involved in the maintenance of that system." At every point he declares the inherent superiority of courts-martial to the civil system. He resents even those criticisms based upon specific instances of injustice, since "they are calculated to undermine unjustly and needlessly the public confidence in that system." He would have the people "know confidently and take pride in the fact that we possess a genuine and adequate system of military justice." He takes "consolation in believing that if the public at large and particularly the families of those men who have been subjected to military discipline during the past two years could realize the thoroughness of this system they would feel entirely satisfied that the system is calculated in its methods to secure ultimate justice for every man." He refers to some futile proposals of his affecting military justice as tending to show that his attitude "has been an advanced one, at least in comparison to others whose authority was superior to mine at the time." He refers to his own career as Judge Advocate General "as demonstrating that it is inherently improbable that any state of things, even remotely justifying some of the extreme epithets recently used in public criticism, could have existed in our Army during the last two years." These expressions alone reflect a stagnant mental pool.

HIS STANDARDS OF JUSTICE.

The Judge Advocate General asserts that he was actuated by the spirit of justice throughout this war, and that he has not been satisfied with anything less than the highest standards of justice. Doubtless swayed by the demands of discipline as he understood them, he did not deliberately do what he knew to be unjust. It is simply a matter of standard of appreciation. He insisted, however, upon maintaining the system unmodified, and the system has led, was leading, and might have been expected to lead to the grossest injustice. Let us examine his standards as illustrated by the very cases used by him.

(a) The case of the Texas "mutineers." In that case certain old noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army had been subjected to the tyrannous and lawless conduct of a superior officer. Their innocence is conceded. They acted well within their rights in quietly refusing to submit to a palpably unlawful command, and for that refusal they were tried and found guilty of mutiny and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment for terms from 10 to 25 years. In this case officers, not men, should have been tried. The trial in its entirety was illegal; the substantial rights of the men were at no point protected; and yet this procedure received the approval of the entire military hierarchy, capped by a major general who approved the sentence and dismissed the men. The Judge Advocate General protected the officers over my protest and denied justice to the men. That was the first case of gross injustice to come to the office after I became its head in August, 1917. I and my associates in the office knew that there would be many like it during the war. The Judge Advocate General admits that this was a "genuine case of injustice" and that it "illustrates the occasional possibility of the military spirit of discipline overshadowing the sense of law and justice." The military minds of the War Department conceded the injustice, conceded the illegality of the proceeding if it could be reviewed for error, but contended that the approval of the major general in command was final and placed the judgment of the court, whether legal or illegal, beyond all power of review. This case presents the crux of the entire difficulty and reveals the fundamental deficiency of the entire system. Courts-martial are controlled not by law but by the power of military command. I held that this could not be, and deduced the authority to review the judgments of courts-martial for errors of law out of existing statutes enacted during the Civil War for the very purpose, statutes which the War Department and compliant Judge Advocate Generals had permitted to become obsolete. The present Judge Advocate General, though he had relinquished all control of his office to become Provost Marshal General, returned to the department and filed an overruling opinion, which the Secretary of War was induced to approve. That opinion established the law for the department that the judgments of courts-martial once approved by the convening authority, however erroneous they may be when tested by legal principles, are beyond all power of legal review and correction. This case presented no more illegality than thousands of others that have since been tried. Clemency was resorted to in that case and the unexecuted punishment remitted, though the men themselves, excellent soldiers of long service, had been branded as mutineers and expelled from the Army in disgrace. Clemency has been resorted to in all such cases as a means of curing, as best it can, the injustice resulting from illegal trials that must go uncorrected. Mercy is given for offenses never committed, and pardon is used where judgments are illegal and should be reversed. This accounts for the wholesale clemency in which the department is indulging. The Judge Advocate General, in order to protect the power of military command, opened the gates to all the injustice of this war. His view was injected into the question. He overruled the opinion of the entire department, consisting of 12 eminent lawyers from civil life, but he succeeded in maintaining supreme the power of military command over military judicial functions. It was under such ruling that the same commanding general in Texas was permitted to hang a half score of negro soldiers immediately upon the completion of the trial and before the records had been reviewed or had even been dispatched from his headquarters to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for whatever revision the statute might be thought by him to require. In those cases the Judge Advocate General, as a result of his construction, engaged in the futile task of "reviewing" the proceedings four months after the accused men had been hanged.

(b) "Burglary" case, No. 110595. This is another case used to illustrate the beneficence of the system. This accused was charged with burglary, and at the end of the trial the court acquitted him. But the commanding general disagreed. He ordered the court to reconvene, and told it that the evidence, to say the least, looked "very incriminatory." The court upon reconsideration as ordered found the accused guilty and sentenced him to be dishonorably discharged and to confinement at hard labor for five years. The Judge Advocate General, in his statement, says: "His (the accused) story was disbelieved and he was found guilty." This is not true; his story was believed and he was acquitted, and it was not until the camp commander ordered a reconsideration that the court convicted him. The Judge Advocate General further says:

> This office reached the opinion that though there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, the evidence did not go so far as to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

A lawyer would be expected to suppose that in a criminal case the evidence in order to be sufficient must be such as to convince the court beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. However, the record shows that the office of the Judge Advocate General said in the review of this case:

> After careful consideration of the evidence, this office is firmly convinced of the absolute innocence of the accused.

As indicating a lack of power in the Judge Advocate General's office to give effect to a conclusion of this sort, a copy of the review was addressed to the camp commander "in order that the reviewing authority may have the benefit of the study referred to."

The Judge Advocate General's report also says:

> In such a situation no supreme court in the United States would interfere and set aside a jury's verdict. Nevertheless this office recommended a reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority.

The great fact to be noted is that such a case as this would never have come to any appellate court, because the original acquittal could never have been set aside. And if the case could have gone to any appellate court upon evidence as weak as this, after a fair jury had once found an acquittal, there could never be any doubt about what action the court would take. However, the office of the Judge Advocate General did not recommend the reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority. It only expressed its own serious doubt and referred its "study" to the reviewing authority "for such consideration as he may deem advisable to give it." This case well represents the whole difficulty due to the lack of authority in the office of the Judge Advocate General to do more than present "studies."

Gen. Crowder's defense says:

> It (the verdict) was, in fact, reconsidered; but the court adhered to its finding.

This is not true. After the Judge Advocate General's office had "studied" the case it never went back to the court. The "study" was simply sent to the reviewing authority and the court never had any opportunity to see that "study."

The Judge Advocate General's report says:

> But the feature for emphatic notice is that reconsideration was given, not by exercising the "arbitrary discretion of a military commander" but by referring the case to the judge advocate of the command as legal adviser.

The judge advocate wrote an elaborate review of the evidence, disagreeing with the view of the Judge Advocate General. This illustrates the necessity for final power in the office of the Judge Advocate General. It is to be noted here (1) that the judge advocate who made the elaborate review was the same judge advocate that recommended trial in the first instance; (2) he was the officer on the staff of the camp commander who ordered the trial and who insisted on a conviction instead of an acquittal; (3) to show his bias, he undertakes to say in his review that the court could not have been influenced by the camp commander when it was instructed by him to change its findings from not guilty to guilty; (4) he himself says that he believed that the court was impressed with the "ring of sincerity" of the case when it first voted his acquittal of the charges, and added that he himself was so impressed when he first preliminarily examined the case; (5) the judge advocate's review consists of a belabored argument of 18 pages and is supplemented by a semipersonal note to the Judge Advocate General insisting upon the guilt of the accused. This is a good example of the fact that under the present law judge advocates do not consider themselves as judicial officers at all, but simply as staff officers supporting the views of the camp commander; nor do they consider the office of the Judge Advocate General as a judicial office, for such a relation would bar such semipersonal correspondence. Moreover, this review speaks many times, in what amounts to a slurring manner, of the "study" made by the Judge Advocate General.

The Judge Advocate General's report further says that this reconsideration on the point of proof beyond a reasonable doubt "was a measure of protection which the law does not provide in any civil court for the control of a jury's verdict." As indicated before, the verdict of the jury would have promptly acquitted this man. There would have been no occasion to review it. If a case should get to an appellate court in which the evidence was so weak as to result first in an acquittal, and then required military direction to change it to a conviction, and then two superior reviewing judge advocates pronounced the evidence insufficient to sustain the finding, nobody can have any doubt what a court of appeals would do.

The Judge Advocate General's defense says:

> The case is a good illustration of the feature in which the system of military justice sometimes does even more for the accused than a system of civil justice.

This should be admitted. It does do more. It does it hard and a plenty.

It may be well to add that since the Chamberlain speech was made the justice of the sentence in this case has been reexamined in the office of the Judge Advocate General upon an application for clemency, and as a result Gen. Crowder, on February 12, 1919, recommended that the unexecuted portion of the sentence be remitted and that the prisoner be released and restored to duty. This recommendation contains the ironical statement that the accused had served nearly one year of his sentence. Here is also a strange admission in the general's memorandum:

This office is strongly of the opinion that injustice may have been done to this man, and that it should be righted now so far as possible.

It is a remarkable coincidence that Gen. Crowder signed this memorandum on the same day that he signed his defense in which he vigorously contends for the rightful results of the case.

(c) The four death cases from France: The next cases cited by the Judge Advocate General as illustrating the justice with which the system meets "the stern necessities of war discipline" were four death sentences from France in the cases of four 18-year-old boys, who had volunteered at the beginning of the war—Nos. 110753, 110754, and the companion cases, 110751 and 110752. These were the first death sentences received from France. In the first two the death penalty was awarded for a charge of sleeping upon post, and in the last two for refusal to go to drill. The trials were legal farces, as any lawyer who will look at the records will see. In each of two of the cases the trial consumed about three-quarters of an hour, and the record occupies less than four loosely typewritten pages. The other two consumed slightly more time, and resulted in a slightly larger record. The courts were not properly composed and in two of the cases were clearly disqualified. The accused were virtually denied the assistance of counsel and the right of defense. A second lieutenant as counsel made no effort to assist. That they were hindered rather than helped in their defense by counsel is demonstrated by the fact that in the case where a plea of guilty was entered the sole effort of counsel consisted of his calling a witness and asking him this question:

Q. Was the accused's record good up to this time?—A. It was not. It is one of the worst in the company.

Two pleaded guilty to a capital offense and the other two made not the slightest fight for their lives. Even if the men had been properly tried and convicted, no just judge could have awarded the death penalty. These young soldiers had been driven to the point of extreme exhaustion. At the time of commission of the offenses, the military authorities evidently regarded them lightly. The two who were charged with sleeping on post were not relieved from post nor were they arrested or accused for 10 days thereafter, and the two who were charged with refusal to go to drill were not arrested or charged for a month thereafter. But at this juncture the authorities abruptly changed their policy, and decided to make an example of these men. Gen. Pershing, who under the law had nothing whatever to do with these cases, injected his power and authority into the course of justice, clamored for the death penalty, and asked that the cable be used to transmit to him the mandate of death.

According to the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Pershing urged the adoption of the inexorable policy of awarding the death penalty in all cases of sleeping on post, and he insists that no one should be criticized for agreeing with this policy or acceding to Gen. Pershing's urgent request. And then the Judge Advocate General makes this surprising statement:

I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to defer to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency.

The record shows an entirely different attitude. It shows that on March 29 to April 4 Gen. Crowder wrote the reviews in these cases, but did not as yet conclude them with his recommendation. On April 5 he sent them to Gen. March in this unfinished state, accompanied by a letter in which, while indicating that by right and justice these boys ought not to die, he suggested, nevertheless, that since Gen. Pershing insisted upon the death penalty the department should uphold him and present a united front to the President. He asked for a conference with the Chief of Staff in order that there might be unanimity in the department to that end. Here is his language:

You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

It would be unfortunate indeed if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records were legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think if we extend clemency that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at an early date?

He did confer with Gen. March, and they agreed to present the united front, to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing, and to recommend the execution of the sentence of death. On April 6 Gen. Crowder brought back from his conference with the Chief of Staff the unfinished reviews and immediately concluded them by adding to them the following recommendation:

I recommend that the sentences be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an Executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect should such action meet with your approval.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Gen. Crowder says that he was "disposed to defer" to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but the record shows that he did defer.

The record also contradicts his statement that—continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency.

And the record also disproves his statement that after an examination by several of the most experienced judge advocates of his staff "no reversible error was found, and there was no doubt of the facts in either case, the only issue in the cases being the severity of the sentences." The record shows that on April 15 I, accidentally hearing about these cases, filed a memorandum in which I pointed out with all the power within me not only reversible error, but annihilating error, and urged that these sentences be set aside and these young soldiers be not executed. And three other judge advocates expressed full concurrence in my views. The record further shows that on April 10 still another judge advocate of high rank, whom Gen. Crowder esteems as a splendid lawyer and who supports the general's views on military justice, filed with him a long memorandum to the effect that these trials were a tragic farce and concluded that—it will be difficult to defend or justify the execution of these death sentences by way of punishment or upon any ground other than that as a matter of pure military expediency some one should be executed for the moral effect such action shall have upon the other soldiers.

These memoranda the general did not forward to superior authority, but the record shows that upon reading them and "upon continued reflection" the next day, April 16, he addressed a memorandum to Gen. March, which began as follows:

Since our interview on the four cases from France, involving the death sentences, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with the recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited.

He then sets out some, but by no means all, of the facts of these memoranda, simply passing them on to the Chief of Staff "for his information." He did not deem them sufficient to modify his own conclusion or his agreement with the Chief of Staff, for near the close of the memorandum he expressly declared that he submits them without any desire "to reopen the case," and he then concludes as follows:

It will not have escaped your notice that Gen. Pershing has no office of review in these cases. He seems to have required that these cases be sent to him for the purpose of putting on the record an expression of his views that all four men should be placed before the firing squad. I do not make this statement for the purpose of criticizing his action—indeed, I sympathize with it—but it is fair in the consideration of the action to be taken here to bear in mind the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution, but as commanding general, anxious to maintain the discipline of his command.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

No case could furnish better evidence of what happens when the chief judicial officer of the Army is subject to the power of military command, is "supervised" by it, and must rely upon it for his appointment to and retention in office; and the fact that these men did not die, as the military hierarchy would have had them die, was not due to the Judge Advocate General of the Army; and the fact tLat they came perilously close to an unlawful death and were deprived of protection for themselves, and have been unlawfully subjected to penitentiary servitude, was due to the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

When Gen. Crowder first replied to the Chamberlain criticism and my own, he made reference to other cases, which he deemed to be beyond criticism and illustrative of the justice of the system, which he now significantly omits. I will supply them:

(d) John Schroeder, Machine Gun Company, One hundred and fifty-sixth Infantry, was convicted of absenting himself without leave from May 9 to 15, when his command was about to embark for overseas service. The gravamen of this offense is obviously the intention to avoid overseas service, as pointed out in the Crowder report, by the division judge advocate, and by Gen. Hodges, who, in his review of June 19, 1918, congratulated the court "in adjudging an adequate sentence and thereby demonstrating its disapproval of an act of a soldier's absenting himself" without permission immediately following his designation for overseas service. This, of course, is one of the most serious offenses, notwithstanding which the accused, represented by an inexperienced first lieutenant as counsel, pleaded guilty; and it is also shown that while without counsel he was approached by an investigating officer, who reported that "the accused declines to make a statement, but says that he will plead guilty," indicating that there was some inducement for the plea. The accused, however, at the trial and after his plea of guilty, stated under oath that he went home for the purpose of seeing a sick mother, and, besides, that he did not know that the company was going abroad and had never been informed of that fact. This statement, absolutely inconsistent with his plea, required the entry of a plea of "not guilty" and a trial of the general issue. There being no evidence whatever to show that the accused was informed that his company was going abroad, the court should have taken the statement of the accused as true and acquitted him. This is an excellent example of a meaningless trial. The accused had no counsel worthy of the name; he did not appreciate nor was he advised of the gist of the offense; he made an ill-advised and uncomprehending plea of guilty, and then made statements absolutely inconsistent with his plea, all of which went unnoticed and resulted in his being sentenced to be dishonorably discharged and to be confined at hard labor for 25 years.

(e) No. 106800 is a sort of companion case to the immediately preceding one. The gist of the offense, here as there, is to be found in the intention to escape overseas service. This accused was also defended by worse than no counsel. The whole proceeding is invalid for the reason that the court disposed of it as though the accused had entered a plea of guilty, whereas he pleaded "to the specification, not guilty; to the charge, guilty." The important part of the plea is, of course, the plea to the specification, the plea to the charge being mere form and may be ignored.

This being a plea of not guilty, the accused should have been tried accordingly. As showing the lax method of the court, even on an assumption of a valid plea of guilty, the accused made a sworn statement absolutely inconsistent with his plea, saying that he did not know and had not been informed that he was ordered to overseas service. He was sentenced to 15 years confinement, and the court was commended, as in the previous case.

(f) No. 114717 was a charge of sleeping on post, in this country, and a plea of guilty. The accused, referred to as "but a little kid," was said to have been found asleep by a lieutenant. This was a capital crime in which the accused, but 17 years old, was permitted by inexperienced counsel to plead guilty, for which he was sentenced to 10 years. The whole proceeding occupies seven pages of loosely twpewritten matter double spaced. The court submitted a recommendation for clemency, asking for a reduction of the sentence on the ground that inasmuch as the accused had pleaded guilty they had been reluctant but compelled to give him a sentence commensurate with the offense, and also on the ground of his youth.

(g) No. 113076. This is a case in which Gen. Crowder contended that the sentinel had been drinking whisky before going on guard and that, having been found asleep thereafter, the case was plainly one for severest exemplary punishment. It is passing strange how justice can hurdle the salient point that an example ought to have been made not so much of the man as of an officer who in violation of regulations and common sense will post as a sentinel a man who had obviously been drinking.

These cases—and there are thousands like them in point of illegality and injustice—are sufficient to show what the Judge Advocate General terms "the general state of things in the administration of military justice."

HIS SPECIFIC CONTENTIONS.

(1) He contends that courts-martial procedure is in accordance with the "rigid limitations of the criminal code" and not according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer.

There are no "rigid limitations" of the code. That is the trouble. The military code is worthy of the name of law only in the sense that any absolute and unregulated power established by law is worthy of it. Congress has authorized military power to do as it pleases in the exercise of this highly penal jurisdiction. Look at the articles from first to last. Is there a word to regulate the preferring of the charge, the arrest, the sufficiency of the charge, the rights of the accused before, at, and after trial? Is there any standard of law to which the court-martial procedure must conform? Is there a single provision for the legal ascertainment of errors and the correction of them? None. All this is committed not to law but to the power of military command. The power of military command determines whether or not there is reasonable ground to believe that the offense has been committed and that the accused committed it. Military power determines whether there is a prima facie case. Military power selects the judges. Military power selects such counsel as the accused may have. Military power determines the legal sufficiency of the charge. Military power determines the kind and competency and sufficiency of proof. Military power passes finally upon every question of law that can arise in the progress of the trial. And military power finally passes upon the legality of the judgment and the entire proceedings. This is one code, criminal in character, that does not recognize principles of law and does not contemplate the services of a single man skilled in the law. Thus there is no standard by which error may be determined except the view of the commanding general. Whatever he determines is right is right, and whatever he determines is wrong is wrong, by virtue of his determination alone. Under such a system, of course, there can be no such thing as error of law; there can only be a variation from whatever the commanding general believes to be right. And from his decision there is no appeal. There is no power on earth to review his decision with authority to say that it is wrong as a matter of law.

And should not a criminal code define the offenses and prescribe the penalties, if it is worthy of the name of law? Look at the code. There are 29 punitive articles. Not one of them defines any offense. The definition is to be found in the common law military, or what military men conceive to be the customs of the service. Not one of them prescribes the penalty.

The court-martial is authorized to award any punishment it pleases. Twenty-nine of these articles conclude by each declaring that the offense punishable therein shall be punished "as the court-martial may direct," which means any punishment less than death. Eleven of them authorize any punishment "that a court-martial may direct, including death," and two of them mandatorily prescribe death. Why should there not have been shocking punishments, shocking both because of their harshness and because of their senseless variations, when courts-martial have unlimited authority to punish as they please? I myself can not conceive that lawyers believe in such delegations of legislative power, either on principle or as a matter of policy. True it is that in times of peace Congress has authorized the President, if he sees fit, to prescribe certain maximum punishments, thus limiting the discretion of courts-martial. This is, nevertheless, an unwise if not an unlawful delegation, inasmuch as a matter of practical administration the military authorities, and not the President, prescribe such limits. Its only effect is to transfer the unlimited power of prescribing the punishment from the several courts-martial to a single military authority of the War Department. It is equally an abdication by Congress itself to prescribe the offense and the punishment.

Does the code contemplate the participation of a single lawyer? Of course lawyers are used in the system. During this war we had a large corps of judge advocates. But they are without authority. They were upon the staff of the commanding general, and like all other staff officers are to do his bidding and be governed by him. No distinction is made between the legal staff and the purely military or administrative staff. It is presumed that the commanding general is as competent in the field of law as he is in the field of tactics, and as a general rule the word of his legal staff officer means little to him. The authority is the authority of the commanding general. Congress has conferred it upon him, and we may expect a military man, of all men, to exercise it. Lawyers are like other ordinary human beings. They are dependent upon the commanding general for advancement and recognition and professional success in the Army. Having no power and authority of his own, a lawyer may not be expected to do other than support the view of his commanding general as best he can, whether right or wrong. Indeed, that he should do so is one of the tenets of the military profession. There is but one will—that is the will of the commanding general. I have seen lawyers placed in this position abase themselves in the face of military authority to the point where one would incline to doubt whether they had not abandoned their professional principles altogether. A member of the Board of Review appearing before the committee of the American Bar Association recently made the following statement:

> While in many cases the trials of enlisted men are not so elaborate as the trials of officers, and in many cases the rules of evidence are not observed and counsel is obviously inadequate, while in a considerable percentage of cases we find that the decision is not sustained by the fact, still I do not recall a single case in which morally we were not convinced that the accused was guilty.

And in this statement other judge advocates concurred. Verily they have received their reward. Such a statement shows to what extent subjection to the power of military command deflects legal judgments, imposes itself upon professional appreciations, and obscures those first principles which are normally regarded as the foundation stones of the temple of justice. The last man in the world to be expected to prefer his personal impression of moral guilt to guilt duly adjudged, his own judgment to the judgment of a court of law, should be the lawyer. Think a moment what it means for a lawyer sitting in a judicial capacity to say:

> We find the soldier has not been well tried; we find that the rules of evidence were transgressed in his case; we find that he had not the substantial assistance of counsel; we even find that the decision was not sustained by the facts of record; yet we are morally convinced that the accused was guilty, so let him be punished.

That means something worse than injustice to the accused; that is the argument of the mob; that is the road to anarchy. I myself prefer the statement made by Warren, in answering the same contention in the British Army nearly 90 years ago:

> It concerns the safety of all citizens alike that legal guilt should be made the sole condition for legal punishment; for legal guilt rightly understood is nothing but moral guilt ascertained according to those rules of trial which experience and regulation have combined to suggest for the security of the State at large. * * * They (these fundamental principles of our law) have, nevertheless, been lost sight of and with a disastrous effect by the military authorities conducting and supporting the validity of the proceedings about to be brought before your majesty.

And the chief of all judge advocates, the Judge Advocate General himself, is also subject to this military power at its very height. He himself has not one particle of authority; he also may advise and recommend to the Chief of Staff, the highest exponent of military authority. By statute the Judge Advocate General is placed under the "supervision" of the Chief of Staff; by the statute also the Judge Advocate General will hold office for a term of four years unless sooner relieved or unless reappointed. He is subject to the supervision, power, and control of the Chief of Staff just as is the chief of the department that issues the rations, supplies, and matériel, or makes a military plan. His retention of office depends upon the approving judgment of the Chief of Staff. Such a man can not be independent, and in the end must be influenced by what the military authorities would have him do. That this is so is observable daily.

From top to bottom the administration of military justice is not governed by the rigid limitations of the code, but by the rigid powers of military command.

It is to be noted that throughout his defense the Judge Advocate General claims that the punishments have been comparatively light, since the code imposed no limit. The code should limit punishment. The difficulty is it does not.

(2) He contends that the code is modern and enlightened.

He admits that prior to his "revision" of 1916, it was the British code of 1774, and I say that his "revision" did not revise, and that we still have the British code of 1774, itself of even more ancient origin. The best proof that our present articles are organically the British articles of 1774 is to be found by comparing the two. The next best evidence is to be had out of the mouths of the highest officials who proposed the so-called revision of 1916, now relied upon as a complete modernization of the old British code. The British code was adopted under the exigency of the Revolution, and John Adams, the chief instrument in securing the adoption, attributed his surprising success to that emergent situation. There were few minor changes made during the Revolution, and up to the so-called code of 1806. In his statement to the Military Committee, the Judge Advocate General on May 14, 1912, said:

> As our code existed, it was substantially the same as the code of 1806.

And he also showed that the code of 1806 was substantially the code of 1774. Of this code of 1806, he said:

> The 1806 code was a reenactment of the articles in force during the Revolutionary War period, with only such modifications as were necessary to adapt them to the Constitution of the United States.

The modifications that were deemed necessary were simply such modifications as were necessary to make the articles fit into the mere machinery of our Government, and introduced the requisite terminology therefor. Speaking of his so-called revision of 1916, the Judge Advocate General said:

> It is thus accurate to say that during the long interval between 1806 and 1912—106 years—our military code has undergone no change except that which has been accomplished by piecemeal amendment. Of the 101 articles which made up the code of 1806, 87 survive in the present code unchanged, and most of the remainder without substantial change. Meanwhile, the British articles from which, as we have seen, these articles were largely taken, has been, mainly through the medium of the army annual act, revised almost out of recognition, indicating that the Government with which it originated has recognized its inadaptability to modern service conditions.

The so-called revision of 1916 was only a verbal one and not an organic revision. This a comparison with the code as it previously existed will demonstrate. The proponents of the revision themselves so stated; they did not contemplate the making of a single fundamental change. This was clearly shown in the letter of the Secretary of War to the Committee on Military Affairs under date of May 18, 1912, and it is equally clearly shown by the letter of the Judge Advocate General submitting the project, in which he described "the more important changes sought to be made" as those of "arrangement and classification." Nobody, either the Judge Advocate General, the Secretary of War, or either committee of Congress, has ever regarded the project of 1916 as a substantial revision. The Judge Advocate General took occasion to deny that it was anything but a restatement of existing law for the sake of convenience and clarity. He himself pledged the committee—

> If Congress enacts this revision, the service will not be cognizant of any material changes in the procedure, and courts will function much the same as heretofore.

Such revision as was made made the structure rest even more firmly upon the principles that courts-martial are absolutely subject to the power of military command.

(3) He contends that the commanding officer may not put a man on trial without a preliminary hearing into the probability of the charge.

Notice, he does not say the code requires such hearing, but that regulations and orders of the War Department do. Therein lies the deficiency. Law is a rule established by a common superior, and as between the man to be tried and the officer ordering his trial such a regulation is not law. It establishes no right. Its only sanction is in the authority that issued it. It may be inadequate, ignored, disobeyed, modified, revoked, or its violation waived without involving the rights of the man to be tried. As a matter of fact well known in the Army, such preliminary investigation as is prescribed is as a rule perfunctorily made. It must not be presumed to be very thorough when 96 per cent of all charges drawn are ordered for trial. The failure to provide for an investigation whereby it shall be legally determined that there is a prima facie case is at the origin of the great number of trials and is therefore the source of much of the injustice.

Any officer can prefer charges against any enlisted man by virtue of his official status alone. The Judge Advocate General says that the Army follows the Anglo-American system of filing an information by a prosecuting officer. Of course not. Any officer may prefer charges. He acts under no special requirement or sense of obligation. The Judge Advocate General naively says that "this protection is invariable." Would you call it a protection if every man under the sun standing one degree above you in wealth or social position or official position had the power to indict you or inform against you and subject you to a criminal trial? Would you agree that even every civil officer in the land should have such a power over a civilian? And yet, every Army officer has that power by virtue of his office alone.

(4) He insists that there have not been too many trials; indeed, that there have been comparatively few.

He admits that in the year preceding the armistice there were 28,000 general courts-martial and 340,000 inferior courts. He uses 4,000,000 as the size of the Army during the period, whereas the average for the period was, of course, less than 2,000,000. Applying the ratio of Army trials to the population of the United States, you would have 1,500,000 felonies and 19,000,000 misdemeanors tried annually. Comparison will also show that we tried seven times as many men per thousand per year as either France or England. He takes great consolation in the fact that the percentage of trials was smaller in the war Army than in the old Regular Army. That is true, but a cause for shame, not consolation. The system as applied to the Army in peace was intolerable. General courts-martial in the Regular Army averaged six per hundred men per annum. Applying the Regular Army ratio of trials to the National Army, the result would have been for the year mentioned 120,000 general courts-martial and 1,500,000 inferior courts-martial, surely a number that would have destroyed any army.

The Judge Advocate General and the War Department now say that the injustices revealed during the war have been due largely to the new officer. Quite the contrary. The records show that the new officer, bringing into the Army his civilian sense of justice, has preferred and ordered fewer courts-martial than the regular. It must be remembered also that the old experienced Regular Army officers have been the officers with the authority to convene general courts-martial and approve the punishments awarded by them. They are therefore responsible.

In any event, inasmuch as our wars are to be fought by citizen soldiers, no system ought to be maintained that must inevitably result in injustice by reason of the inexperience of the men.

(5) He contends that our officers are sufficiently grounded in the law to be military judges.

This, again, is a matter of standards. It may be informative to point out the inconsistency between the statement that the new officers are responsible for the deficiencies of the administration of military justice developed during the war and the contention that they are competent military judges. Of course, they are not competent as judges. A case before a court-martial involves the entire criminal law. Courts-martial are judge as well as jury. His regard for the judicial requisites can be properly appreciated in view of his argument that the study of the brief course in the elements of law at West Point or of the course, by the new officers, in the three months' training camp is sufficient "to insure an acquaintance with the law by the members of a court-martial."

In any event, he says, the deficiencies of the trial court will find their corrective supplement in the reviewing judge advocate—one system of legal mechanics that stands the pyramid on its pinnacle.

(6) He contends that the judge advocate does not combine the incompatible function of prosecutor, adviser of the court, and defender of the accused.

The law and universal practice are otherwise. The judge advocate shall prosecute in the name of the United States (art. 17). If accused is not represented, the judge advocate shall, throughout the proceedings, advise him of his legal rights (art. 17). This is defined to be the substantial duty of counsel (par. 96, M. C. M.). The judge advocate is the legal adviser of the court (par. 99, M. C. M.). There are cases in which a single officer set a trap for the accused, was the prosecuting witness, was appointed judge advocate to prosecute the case, and, besides, was also specially detailed as counsel for the accused, and performed all functions. For such an instance, see case of Pvt. Claud Bates, in which, when I pointed out these inconsistencies, the commanding general complained I was "trying to break up our court-martial system."

(7) He resents the criticism that second lieutenants, knowing nothing of law and less of court-martial procedure, are assigned to the defense of enlisted men charged with capital or other serious offenses.

He admits, however, that in an examination of 20 cases a lieutenant appeared as counsel in 13 of them. I can go further and say that in an examination of 5,000 cases lieutenants of but few months' experience appeared in 3,871, or 77 per cent of them. This was perfectly natural; under the system of administration the duty of counsel is an irksome one, imposed upon those who have not enough rank and standing to avoid it. He also contends that all officers are properly equipped to perform the duties of counsel, by reason of the fact, already stated, "that graduates of every training camp have studied and passed an examination upon the Manual for Courts-Martial, and therefore the above criticism is upon its face unfounded." He also finds that after officers of rank and experience have been assigned as members of the court and as judge advocate it is not feasible to find legally qualified officers to act as counsel. "No one," he says, "who has any acquaintance at all with conditions in the theater of war would suppose for a moment that this is practicable." He then dismisses the whole subject by saying that, no matter how incompetent is counsel, he finds in the scrutiny subsequently given the cases "the most satisfactory assurance that such deficiencies as may from time to time occur through the inexperience of officers assigned for the defense have been adequately cured." It might be remarked that it is a rather sad criticism of any judicial system that it regards military rank as the main assurance of efficiency.

(8) He is inclined to resist the view that improvident pleas of guilty are received from those charged with capital crimes.

He says the percentage of such pleas is a small one; and so it should be hoped, although such pleas are known to be surprisingly frequent. As an argument to offset the inference of resultant injustice, he relies upon "the common instincts of fairness and justice of the officers taken recently from civilian life to sit upon the courts as judges." It is interesting to note that shortly before this, in a public address before the bar of Chicago, the Judge Advocate General attributed the harshness of the system to the inexperience of the new officers, as follows:

> Undoubtedly there are things wrong with the administration of military justice. We have brought over 100,000 officers into the Military Establishment of the United States within the brief space of a year. Their commissions are their credentials to sit in the courts and administer justice, and it would be strange, indeed, if there were not a number of cases in which a disproportionate punishment is given.

(9) He admits that commanding generals return acquittals to the courts with directions to reconsider them.

He thinks, however, that "the very object of this institution is to secure the due application of the law," and he adds: "My own experience in the field can recall more than one case in which the verdict of acquittal was notoriously unsound, and in which the action of the commanding general in returning the case furnished a needed opportunity for doing full justice in the case." He finds "that this power is a useful one, and that it is not in fact in any appreciable number of cases so exercised as to amount to abuse of the commanding general's military prestige." He finds that out of 1,000 cases there are only 95 acquittals, anyway, and he says:

> Of these 95 acquittals 39 were returned only for formal correction; of the remaining 56 the court adhered to its original judgment in 38 cases, and in only 18 cases was the judgment of acquittal revoked upon reconsideration and the accused found guilty of any offense.

Though of every 95 acquittals 18 are changed into convictions by the direction of the commanding general, this he considers negligible. This leaves only 77 acquittals out of a thousand tried. Out of deference to unreasonable public opinion, however, he would recommend a change to accord with "the British practice," which he regards as the limit of liberality.

(10) He contends that under all the circumstances the sentences imposed by courts-martial are not, as a rule, excessively severe.

He indicates clearly that we would have profited by "keeping in mind the solemn and terrible warning recorded expressly for our benefit by Brig. Gen. Oakes," in the Civil War, that the inexorable attitude of shooting all deserters would prove merciful in the end, and argues that inasmuch as we did not adopt that policy we should not be "reproached for severity." Dealing with the offense of absence without leave, he would have us believe that "this offense is in many cases virtually the offense of an actual desertion," whereas exactly the opposite is true. The records will show that absence without leave is more frequently than otherwise charged as desertion, since in cases of "doubt" the higher offense is always charged; besides, several commanding officers ordered that all absences even for a few days be charged and tried as desertion. There has been no greater source of injustice than the indiscriminate treatment of absence without leave as desertion and the procurement of convictions accordingly. Along the same line the Judge Advocate General argues that disobedience of orders is always to be punished most severely without regard to the kind or materiality of the order, and he asserts that the disintegration of the Russian Army was due not to age-long tyranny or oppression or reaction, or any other like cause, but entirely to a failure to treat "disobedience in small things and great alike."

Finally, however, after much argument, he concedes that these sentences were long, but justifies them on the ground that "the code prescribes no minimum" and on the further ground "that probably none of these officers (who pronounce sentences) supposed for a moment that these long terms would actually be served"; and he reminds us that there has already been a 90 per cent reduction. He ignores the fact that whether such sentences were or were not intended to be served, they greatly outraged justice. If intended to be served, they abused justice; if not so intended, they mocked it. He says "nobody intended they should be served," which, as one writer has recently put it, is "like hanging up a scarecrow to frighten the birds, that does not scare them as soon as they learn that it is a sham, and then use it to rest on."

(12) He admits that the sentences of courts-martial are very variable for the same offense.

He delights in the fact, however, that "this very matter of variation in sentences is one of the triumphs of modern criminal law," and finds virtue in a situation that gives courts-martial "full play for the adaptation of the sentences to the individual case." A court should have sufficient latitude to make the sentence fit the offense, but I had not supposed that this "modern triumph" would authorize any court—not even a court-martial possessing the virtue of being untrained, unlettered, and unskilled in the administration of justice—to punish an offense.

however trivial, "as it may direct," with life imprisonment or death, if it pleases.

(13) He denies that the Judge Advocate General's office partakes in the attitude of severity.

His defense speaks rather loudly for itself. I must be permitted to say this: Every organ of that office designed to secure correctness of court-martial procedure or moderation of sentences—which now he calls so effectively to his aid—was instituted by me and by me alone. Without any authority from or help of the War Department or of the Judge Advocate General I organized the several divisions of the office; the board of review and the first and second divisions thereof; and the clemency board; and it was my effort, taken in his absence, that showed the necessity for the special clemency board, which, though restricted in every covert way by the department and the office of the Judge Advocate General, has done so much recently to reduce sentences. The Judge Advocate General's attitude has been one of absolute reaction. He has not approved of such organization; he has not approved of my efforts to secure correctness of court-martial judgments or moderation of them. Twice have I been relieved by him from all participation in matters of military justice and superseded by officers who shared his views. He says:

> On the 20th of January you (the Secretary) approved a recommendation of mine, dated January 18, opposing the institution of a system of review for the purpose of equalizing punishment through recommendations for clemency.

He does not say, however, that this was done at my insistence, not his; that when he returned to the office last January he published a written office order relieving me from all connection with administration of military justice.

He does not say that on or about January 8 I went to him and urged that something be done to modify courts-martial sentences, and that he declined to take any action, as "to do so would impeach the military judicial machinery."

He does not say that while he was absent from the office a few days thereafter I filed with the Secretary of War a memorandum, dated January 11, 1919, in which I depicted the shocking severity of courts-martial sentences, and that I was driven to take advantage of Gen. Crowder's absence to bring this to the attention of the Secretary of War. He does not point out that he had me demoted because I did not share his views upon the subject of military justice and had me superseded by an officer who did. He does not point out that notwithstanding he kept me as president of the clemency board, as an assurance to the public that clemency would be granted, he "packed" that board with the officer who wrote this defense of the Judge Advocate General, the chief propagandist for the maintenance of the system, and with other friends of his who shared his reactionary views. He does not point out that the clemency board was given no jurisdiction to recommend clemency for the prisoners in France, since "the people at home were not so interested in the men who had committed offenses in the theater of operations"; that is, the prisoners in France were not in a position to become politically articulate or embarrasing to the department. He does not point out that the dissolution of the clemency board had been determined upon, and I had been notified accordingly, without its having passed upon any of the cases in France, and that those cases were not taken up until recently, and would never have been taken up, except for my written official insistence. He does not point out that a special board of review, composed of men sharing his own views, was constituted, with the sole function of reexamining and revising all findings made by the clemency board wherever clemency was to be based on inadequate trial.

(14) He contends that the action taken in the Judge Advocate General's office has been effectual for justice.

He reaches this conclusion on the ground that seldom or never is the Judge Advocate General's office overruled. Of course, so long as the Judge Advocate General of the Army does what the military authorities want him to do he will not be overruled. When the Judge Advocate General of the Army does, as he did in the death cases from France and as he habitually does, seek an agreement with the Chief of Staff as to what his decision ought to be, when he regards himself not as a judge but as an advocate to uphold the hands of the military authorities, he is not likely to be overruled. I as Acting Judge Advocate General was overruled. I was told by the highest military authorities, in a certain case in which a half score of men were sentenced to be hanged, and in which the military authorities insisted on the execution, notwithstanding the fact that they had not been lawfully tried, that I was disqualifying myself ever to be Judge Advocate General by my insistence upon their rights. Through my insistence, however, these men were not hanged.

You can not expect the Judge Advocate General of the Army to be a judicial officer when the law does not make him one. He himself is subject to the power of military command. By section 4, act of February 14, 1903 (32 Stat., 831), the Judge Advocate General is placed under the "supervision" of the Chief of Staff in the same way that the Subsistence, Quartermaster, Engineer, Medical, Ordnance, and other departments are. He is appointed for four years, he may be relieved if he incurs the displeasure of the department, and he will not be reappointed except with the recommendation and approval of the department. He holds his office, in effect, at the will of the Chief of Staff, under whose supervision he is. If the highest law officer of the Army is subject to such military "supervision," how much more effective must the same "supervision" be over the subordinate officers of the Judge Advocate General's department assigned to the staff of a military commander?

HIS REMEDIES.

The Judge Advocate General now says he favors vesting the President with power to review courts-martial judgments for errors of law, and therefore recommends the enactment of the bill submitted by him last year—section 3692, H. R. 9164. Please look at that bill. If enacted it would (a) effectually place the power in the hands of the Chief of Staff, the head of the military hierarchy; (b) authorize the reversal of an acquittal; (c) authorize increasing the punishment; (d) authorize increasing the degree of guilt determined by the court.

The truth is, the Judge Advocate General does not believe in revisory power. He has ever insisted that military law is the kind of law that "finds its fittest field of application in the camp," and that such revision would militate against the requisite promptness of punishment. He has not acted in good faith. In correspondence with the senior officer of his department on duty with Gen. Pershing's staff, shortly after his submission of the above bill, he expressed his real views and purposes. In that letter, of April 5, he said something had to be done to head off a "threatened congressional investigation," "to silence criticism," "to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal," and "prove that an accused does get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters."

The other remedies proposed, consisting of a few more orders and changes of the manual and empowering the department to prescribe maximum limits of punishment in peace and war, I deemed unworthy of comment.

The Judge Advocate General assumes that he has reached the limit of liberality when he approaches in a few respects what he conceives to be the British system, not appreciating that, though that system is far more liberal than our own, it, too, has become the subject of criticism throughout Britain. The British Government has appointed a committee of inquiry of civilian barristers to examine "the whole system under which justice is administered in the Army." Differing from our own War Department, that Government gives evidence of a desire to know the facts and to find a remedy.

HIS CRITICISMS OF MY PERSONAL CONDUCT.

1. He claims that my efforts to establish a revisory power within the department through the office opinion of November 10 to that end was without his knowledge.

Assuming this to be true, it was well known in the department at that time that he had authorized me to manage the office in my own way and without further reference to him, except for certain appointments having political significance. But, as I heretofore said to the Secretary of War in the paper published in the New York Times, I did take occasion to consult Gen. Crowder upon the subject, and he replied:

> I approve heartily of your effort. Go ahead and put it over. I suspect, however, that you may have some difficulty with the military men arising out of article 37.

I knew of no change of attitude in him until I was advised shortly thereafter that he had prepared a brief in opposition, and two or three days later he resumed charge of the office and filed the brief. When I found this to be so, I went to Gen. Crowder and accosted him about his change of attitude. In explanation thereof he said:

> Ansell, I had to go back on you. I am sorry, but it was necessary to do it in order to save my official reputation.

He then added that he was nearing the end of his service; that he could not afford to be held responsible for the injustice that had gone on, if the existing law could be construed to have prevented it, and adverted to the fact that fixing such responsibility upon him would injure his career in this war. He then told me that the Secretary of War held him personally responsible and had "upbraided" him at the Army and Navy Club for sitting by and permitting this injustice to go uncorrected. The general then said that, humiliated at such imputation, he had gone back to the Provost Marshal General's office and consulted some of his friends there and they decided that it was necessary for his self-protection to oppose the opinion the office had prepared, and that two of the officers there helped him prepare the countermemorandum.

2. He says that I surreptitiously obtained an order appointing me as Acting Judge Advocate General in his absence.

Please look at his defense, pages 54 and 55. He admits that he said:

It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday.

I did take it up in a formal memorandum addressed to the Chief of Staff, the channel of communication prescribed by orders. I never spoke to the Chief of Staff on the subject, and never endeavored in any way to obtain favorable action upon the memorandum. I let it takes its course. Under 1132, Revised Statutes, it was necessary that I be designated as Acting Judge Advocate General if I was to be charged with the policies and responsibilities of the office. Otherwise the policies and responsibilities were Gen. Crowder's, who was not in a position to assume them. In furtherance of his ambitions he held three and sometimes four positions during this war, and he was in no position to perform the duties of Judge Advocate General or prescribe the policies of that office. Therein lies the difficulty. I was held responsible for the output, but for means and power was kept dependent upon an officer who was absent, absorbed in other tasks, and who differed with me on the policy of military justice.

The general bases his charge of surreptition solely on the ground that his approval of my designation as Acting Judge Advocate General was conditioned upon my taking it up "directly" with the Secretary of War. I had assumed that his language was frank and candid and not governed by the quibbling construction he now places upon it.

His other charge of surreptitious method is likewise based solely upon the fact that I made a recommendation on the subject of military justice in France to the Chief of Staff in a written memorandum which spoke for itself and which was never supplemented by any word or action of mine in support of it to secure favorable action. It is quibbling to say, as he does say (p. 58), that my statement to the effect that the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces was opposing means for a better supervision of military justice was untrue for the reason that the opposition was officially voiced to the department not by Gen. Pershing in person, but by his senior judge advocate and staff officer, Gen. Bethel; the staff officer, of course, representing the views of his chief.

3. He says that I myself had at first approved the death penalty in the cases from France. If I had done so, the record would show it. The record is to the contrary. Neither is it to be expected that I should have once approved them and then have written a strong memorandum against approval without reference to my former position. The truth is, at the time the cases were being studied by Gen. Crowder, so far as he did study them, and his assistants, I was away from the office in Canada. Col. Mayes, senior officer in my absence, has recently called my attention to this fact and informs me further that he has recently testified before the Inspector General that he had looked over the cases, but that I had not.

CONCLUSION.

The War Department has indeed undertaken to maintain this vicious system at all costs and by methods which reveal the weakness of both the system and the department.

Very truly, yours,

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, my reason for having the foregoing letter printed in the RECORD is that the country may have the views of Gen. Ansell on the subject of military justice, with which many lawyers agree, in opposition to the views of the Judge Advocate General. While he was in the Army and connected with the office of the Judge Advocate General his lips were sealed and he could only speak by permission of his superior officers, who differed from him, although he was himself for a while Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army. That permission was refused him. Gen. Ansell is himself a graduate of West Point, a distinguished lawyer, as well as a patriotic and gallant soldier. He is a man who has been able to see the humane and the civilian side of these controversies and has fearlessly done all in his power to correct a vicious system of the administration of military justice and to alleviate the punishments which that system has inflicted upon the young men of America who sacrificed all for the protection of their country and the preservation of civilization. His reward for the efforts he has made along these lines has been in practical effect demotion by those in authority, although such men are badly needed to tell the truth in order that a vicious system may be corrected. He voluntarily resigned from the Army, Mr. President, and he can now address himself to the American people in any way he sees fit in order to correct abuses which he knows exist and which all are now beginning to understand have been in vogue during the whole of the World War.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to discuss very briefly a phase of the high cost of living which I believe has not been touched upon in this body.

The remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] the other day impressed me very forcibly when he asked for action. I sometimes think we do not appreciate the depth of feeling in America to-day on this question. On a visit recently to my home State I was met with one inquiry at every turn. It was not, "What are you going to do with the league of nations?" It was not, "When are you going to ratify the treaty?" It was, "What are you going to do in Congress about the high cost of living?" It is the main cause of all the unrest, of all the discontent, of all the strikes, of all the business uncertainty in this country to-day. It is more than that; it is causing distrust of our Government itself. It is giving force and strength to un-Americanisms. The people are asking themselves, "Have we a Government capable of grappling with a great problem like this and able to find a solution for it?" I appeal to the Senate to appreciate that the people want immediate action on this subject. The people of America expect us to meet this problem and to find a solution.

Extracts from two letters among many that have come to me sound this note to which I have tried to give expression; one, from the pastor of a Methodist church in the central part of Massachusetts, reads as follows:

Have we men in public life who are aware of the grievous wrong which has been done the public with regard to the price of necessary household commodities?

I am not a prophet, but this Nation is facing either a revolution or a revival of its moral and religious conscience. You are probably aware of the intense feeling there is in the hearts of laboring men to-day, and I hope God will most graciously sustain you and the other Members of Congress in this the most critical period our Nation has ever experienced. We do not want a soviet republic. We do want a continuation of the Republic which existed here up to about 1900.

The other reads:

We are living in a strenuous period economically, and the average man is not giving much thought to parties nor to platforms. Labor to-day is in the saddle, not only here in America but in Europe as well. Apparently the extreme demands that labor is making cause no surprise to the average student of conditions. * * * The present structure of society, with all that is good as well as bad, may disappear overnight if care is not taken. * * * Now, this tremendous sentiment of unrest is not going to abate; it is going to increase; and in the opinion of an humble, observing citizen, whether we like it or not, labor is going to get just about what it starts after, and that includes Government ownership of things like railroads, coal mines, etc., unless the Government deals effectively with the present evils.

Mr. President, the point I wish to emphasize to-day is that it is high time for action. Ten days have elapsed since the President publicly called this question to our attention. What have we done? What are we going to do? I ask these questions fully realizing that this is a very difficult and serious problem, but, nevertheless, its solution is the way to stop this wave of unrest; it is the way to insure the safety of the Government itself; it is the way to protect democracy in America. What can the Senate do? For after all we want practical suggestions. This Congress can at once restore confidence by showing that it is awake to the situation and proposes to act at once. One of these letters is from a clergyman, who complains about the high cost of living and of having received the same small salary for years; and this is largely true of all the salaried class. Telegrams are also pouring in from postal clerks and many other public employees. Policemen in the capital city of Massachusetts are threatening to strike. All this is due to what? It is because they can not, with their present wage, meet the present cost of living.

I ask again, what can we do? I suggest an answer. One thing we can do that would do more to restore confidence and reassure the people of this country would be an announcement in this Chamber and in the other branch of Congress that the steering committee of the Republican Party and the steering committee of the Democratic Party had met and jointly decided to seek an immediate solution. Joint, immediate, nonpartisan action is what the American people have a right to demand.

It seems to me that if such a course were taken and agreement reached that we would act harmoniously and speedily and construct some legislation it would do very much to restore confidence in our system of government and we would be doing much to assist the people to enjoy the happiness and the prosperity that ought to come with the peace that has been earned at such very great sacrifice.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think I recognize the seriousness of the situation to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has directed our attention. I have been aware of it, apprehensively aware of it, for a long time. The present situation is not one which has suddenly thrust itself upon public attention. It has become accute because of the position of certain organized bodies of men feeling the weight of these conditions and demanding an increase of pay. If Congress can by legislation restore the purchasing power of money, increase the food supply, and in other ways regulate or control the natural laws which surround us, and from whose operations we can not escape, we should do it by all means. But the most sinister feature of the present situation lies in the fact that those who are suffering acutely from prevailing conditions are absorbed with the idea that Congress can relieve them if it would. I say that is dangerous, because it produces those discontents to which the Senator has referred and about which his correspondents have written him.

The unfortunate difficulty is not with the desire of Congress to give relief, but with its ability to do so. If we were asked to legislate for the abolition of the law of gravity, if we were asked to change the seasons by substituting spring for summer and summer for winter, we certainly would recognize and the public would recognize how utterly impossible compliance with such demands would be.

Mr. President, it is a terrible condition, but it is not a new one, neither is it a local one. It is a world-wide one. It has succeeded and has in some degree accompanied every great industrial or military convulsion to which the commercial world has been subject, and it will continue to succeed and accompany them so long as men differ and controversies disturbing the peace of the world shall follow.

We have certainly passed a great many laws already which are being enforced upon the subject, and we can perhaps prevent what is called profiteering, a practice which is, unfortunately, not local, but which is everywhere, and which is merely a reflection of the habits and actions of man when opportunity stands at his elbow.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should dislike to have the Senator change his line of argument, but I wish to ask him if he does not think that one of the causes, a partial cause, for the present high cost of living in America is due to the fact that previous to this war we only exported the surplus over and above our normal demands for foodstuffs, and that during the war and at the present time we are exporting out of the normal demand of our own people for foodstuffs? Does the Senator agree with me that that is in part a cause?

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, Mr. President, anything that reduces the supply necessarily produces a rise in the market.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then will the Senator agree with me that the American people have a right to know that their Government has made an inquiry into what foodstuffs are being shipped out of America that are needed here, and that have increased the cost of the necessities of life, and have a right to know how much is being shipped and whether the amount that is being shipped is absolutely necessary to relieve distress and want on the other side?

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is very apposite. We can not let the world starve, neither should we supply them with food in overabundance, and if that is being done the suggestion of the Senator is extremely pertinent. But if it is done, will that solve this problem?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It will at least help to do it in part. But the point I desire to make is that the American people would, at least, be somewhat appeased if they knew that the food supply which is being exported was actually to relieve want and not to make more money than could be made by selling the food here in America. It is one of the very serious grounds of discontent that we are exporting when we ought not to be exporting. I say the Government ought, at this crisis under these conditions, to stop exporting every single thing that pertains to the necessities of life in America over and above what will actually relieve want and distress on the other side.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the Senator himself inquired for such information?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; and I am collecting such information.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the Senator introduced a resolution seeking such information?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; I have not; but I am asking the Senator the question because he has said the difficulty is beyond the possibility of our being able to grapple with it, and I have tried to point out one question at least that the American people might be interested in knowing about.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not aware of having stated that this was a problem beyond our possibility to legislate about; but quite the contrary. I declared that there are some features of it which could be reached and which laws had been passed to reach. If we are engaged at present in an overexportation of foodstuffs, then, of course, that surplus should not be so diverted from America but should be kept here. I merely wish now to emphasize some of the things which I hope the average thinking man and woman will for a moment dwell upon.

In the first place, I have stated that the condition is not a national one, and, of course, Congress, powerful as it is, can not legislate for the whole world. Therefore it is a condition underlaid by world-wide causes. It must be. What are they? I will not pretend to state them all, but one is the extraordinary inflation of the currency of all the nations. You can not increase the circulating medium of the people without affecting prices. You can not increase the currency of a people and keep the value of the dollar where it was before, not even if that increase is of gold. If a nation possesses a currency of $1,000,000,000 of gold and subsequently adds $2,000,000,000 more to it, thus having a currency circulation basis of $3,000,000,000, the gold dollar possessed by that country will lose its purchasing power in proportion. The only way in which the value of the dollar is measured is in the thing for which it can be exchanged. In this country and in other countries, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on last Friday showed, these increases have been enormous. With us I think it is much more than 100 per cent. I have the figures somewhere. From the instant that our currency increases began they were reflected in current prices and they have continued to be so reflected.

Then, too, Mr. President, we have expanded our credit by an issue of bonds of nearly $30,000,000,000. The inflation of credit added to the inflation of currency aggravates many times the evils consequent upon the reduced and reducing value of the dollar. We can, as the French Assembly did, pass a law requiring the seller of merchandise to take the American dollar at a value fixed by law, and we can guillotine him, as they did in France, if he refuses. But unfortunately that method did not prevail in France; it brought no relief there, and it would not prevail and could bring no relief here. We might just as well attempt to change some other law of nature. I think the people ought to know these facts.

Take another proposition. This country is bearing a burden of taxation that is unprecedented either in America or elsewhere. We expect to raise for the year 1919 something like $6,000,000,000. That must be paid. The people can not escape it. The requirement is hedged about with penalties which no man dare encounter. Every dollar of the National and State taxation which can be is passed on to the next man and finally rests upon the ultimate consumer. I do not pay a cent of tax that is not passed on if it is possible to do so, neither does anybody else. It is a part of the cost which attaches to the business or the income of the taxpayer, and he very naturally makes it good by adding it to the price of his merchandise or his manufacture, and that is borne by the next purchaser, who passes it on until the ultimate consumer bears the burden.

We must not forget that we are all ultimate consumers. Every man, woman, and child in America constitutes a part of that great army. The entire value of the agricultural and meat products of the United States the year before the war, as I remember the figures, was about $7,500,000,000, or very little more than the tax burden which is now passed on to the consumer.

I sometimes wonder whether the prices of the necessities and commodities of life will remain where they are or whether they will continue to advance. I know, or at least I think I know it, that the public will not for years enjoy any permanent relief from the evil of high prices, because for many, many years, running into generations, this burden of taxation will rest upon the productive and consuming energies of the people, and as a consequence we must regard it as one of the heritages of war.

Mr. President, I think the most serious act of my life was the casting of a vote for this war, not because it was not necessary, but largely because as a boy I was in daily contact with the experiences of the Civil War of the early sixties, because those experiences involved the seamy side of that terrible conflict, the agony, the suffering, the destruction of property, the loss of lives, the disappearance of civic institutions, the prevalence of martial conditions both in the Army and in society, and above all the enormous cost of the necessities of life consequent upon the creation of an enormous debt and an undue inflation of currency. I knew that we would win this war, but I also knew that with it would come those terrible costs of victory which spread their evils over many generations of men, and I also feared that they would produce just those social and industrial upheavals which now so seriously disturb the country and which very seriously add to the constantly accelerating cost of the necessities of life, because they diminish consumption, and by demanding a higher wage add a more pressing burden in every direction, upon the Government principally, but upon the operations of those laws which after all govern and control these conditions.

I have opposed in this body, unsuccessfully, every bill having for its purpose an increase of compensation to Government employees. I have done it because I knew the only effect of that grant would be to transform the recipient of these advances into an agency for transferring the amount of the increase into the pockets of the purveyors of the necessities of everyday life; and that has been the case.

It was resisted and resisted. Some Senators and some Representatives went so far as to challenge the accuracy of my position, not the least of whom was a former Representative from my State, a very warm personal friend, Mr. Keating, who is now the secretary of the Congressional Commission on Reclassification of Salaries. Only so late as Saturday last I noticed this statement from Mr. Keating, as it appeared in the Evening Star of this city:

CLERKS' BONUS FAIR GAME FOR SUCH AS PROFITEER.

"Why do you permit landlords, boarding houses, and others to profiteer and raise rents and prices as soon as clerks get a bonus?"

This was the inquiry received to-day by the Joint Congressional Commission on Reclassification of Salaries in the District from somebody who signed himself "Square Deal."

"Square Deal's inquiry is a pertinent one," declared Edward Keating, secretary of the commission. "Unfortunately, he has confused the functions of this committee. But we all recognize the pertinency of his query.

"No sooner does a Government clerk get a bonus than it seems as if something comes along to take it away from him. A vicious circle is formed and will not be stopped until something is thrown into the wheel."

Unfortunately that is the very thing we have been throwing into the wheel and will continue throwing into the wheel and by that means aggravate the condition that we are supposed to improve.

Some days ago the chiefs of the railway brotherhoods made a demand for an extraordinary increase in wages, and at the same time said it would not relieve the situation; that the only effect of it would be to bring the level of prices still higher so as to conform to the increases; and that is true. Every strike for an increase, if granted, will only make it necessary to strike again and to make another demand. This condition will keep rising and rising, and the material man will be always ahead of the fellow who gets the salary, not only in this country but everywhere; not only in this age but in every age. Conditions will continue until something will collapse or explode.

Unfortunately for America, the people generally seem to think that the Government can do everything. We began years ago with a protective tariff, and from that beginning constant requests, demands, and exactions have been made upon the Government until to-day Uncle Sam is visualized as a great institution with an exhaustless Treasury, with all sorts of privileges to bestow upon everybody, and as existing merely for the purpose of helping his children when they get into trouble—feeding them, clothing them, curing them of the colic, seeing to it that they are well educated and that they are coddled and paternalized from the cradle to the grave. It is an unfortunate condition; we are to blame for it, perhaps, quite as much as are the people; but in consequence of it we are face to face with the very ordeal to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has called our attention.

The people assume that we can lower the price of eggs to 10 cents a dozen; that we can restore the price of steak to 10 cents a pound; that we can put the price of canned goods at the dead level they occupied prior to the war; that we can furnish them with $5 shoes and $25 suits just as before, and they propose to take us by the throat if we do not do it. I can not do it. I am going to throw up my hands. If they want my life and my pocketbook and my various little possessions, I can not help it; I am willing to do what I can; but I do not want to deceive the people or any of them who are obsessed with the idea that Congress is possessed of an omnipotence which no human tribunal ever can obtain or exercise.

It is asked, Why does not Congress do something? That is the cry. Under existing laws the Department of Justice is doing something. The Attorney General is gutting all of the cold-storage institutions of the country and is going to bring down the prices in many respects; but next winter when there is a shortage of these identical commodities and prices soar beyond the present level, the same people will rage and reproach the Government for bringing about conditions for which they clamored just before. That is human nature. We will be damned if we do; we will be damned if we don't; and we will possibly be damned anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will formulate any bill—I do not care what it is—which he believes will effect some relief, I think I shall vote for it, although I may not approve it or may be skeptical about its result.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusets. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did the Senator from Colorado hear the address delivered by the President of the United States 10 days ago, requesting legislation?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. I paid very close attention to it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My speech only called for action upon the part of the Senate along the lines indicated by the President; that we do something; that we show to the country that we are not playing politics; that we are not politically divided on this question; but that we are trying to do something to help solve this issue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I heard the President's address. I desire to say I do not think we are politically divided on this question; I think there is a wide difference of opinion among Senators as to what we can do; but I do not think that the difference runs in the center of this aisle. It is a difference of opinion which is outside of and beyond our political affiliations. Every man on the other side and on this side I am satisfied wants to do all that he can. Hearings are being held by the Agricultural and other committees, but, if I am correctly informed, representatives of the great agricultural interests say that we shall not do anything; they declare that if we make any attempt in this direction its only effect will be to limit production. They know this much at least, that if the proposed laws are passed and they think they are going to deprive them of profits, they will quit producing. No man on earth—not even a Bolsheviki—is going to produce unless he sees some profit in it or hopes for some profit or expects some profit, financial or otherwise. If we destroy that element in the business world, we seriously injure it. Hasty legislation, Mr. President, may be worse than no legislation at all. So, in the face of a tremendous problem like this, however impatient the people may be, I can but think that Congress is wise in going just a little slow before taking the final plunge, for the water may be colder or a great deal deeper than we imagine it to be.

What I approved of in the President's message, perhaps, more than any other sentiment expressed in it was his counsel to the people to keep cool, not to lose their tempers, to face conditions quietly, and yet with a determination to overcome them as far as possible, for if we lose our heads we are gone. If the people become exasperated with what they regard as the indifference or the tedium of Congress if some demands that are now made are not complied with—and I do not think that they can be; I do not think that they ought to be—we can not tell what the result may be. We do know that this cause, as the Senator well says, has underlain many of the turbulences and insurrections and social unheavals of the past. When a man is hungry or thinks that he is being outraged in the matter of foodstuffs, he does not stop to reason.

Blind with wrath and a feeling of outrage, he strikes in the dark at everything and anything within reach, and only considers his unwisdom and his folly when it is altogether too late. So that if coolness and the contemplation of things as they are can only prevail we shall come out of this crisis as we have emerged from every other crisis which this country has faced.

Republicans, Mr. President, and Democrats are alike Americans; they alike have the good of the country at heart; their standpoints are different but their object is the same; they are patriots all. While they have their differences, which rise to fever heat in times of exciting political campaigns, that is but the effervescence of Americanism, which is healthy for themselves and for the community.

There is another significant feature of present conditions: There is more industrial unrest and disturbance, there are more strikes and commotions and more turbulence of minorities everywhere just now than at any other period in our history; and yet, strange to say, with it all we are prospering wonderfully. I have been unable to perceive any immediate urgent cases of suffering or indigence, although they may exist; but the general trend of conditions is a pretty well distributed prosperity. I never before saw so much money in circulation, and I have lived nearly 70 years upon this planet of ours. There never was as much money in the savings banks—and it is sound money, it is good money. Wages were never so high; the salaries of employees were never better; indulgence in the luxuries of the world is widespread and almost universal. The jewelers are doing the business of their lives, and the manufacturers of automobiles can not keep up with their orders. One can not go to a theater in this or any other city in the United States by day or by night without finding difficulty in securing a seat. Expensive clothing is the rule and not the exception; the people are well dressed everywhere, but torn by discontent—well founded in most cases—and totally unsatisfied with prevailing conditions. Thrift is a forgotten virtue. That was the old element in the prosperity of the Nation—thrift, frugality, economy, saving something at the end of every month or at the end of every year, living within your income. Now the policy is to spend all you get, and, if you want more, strike for it, get it in that way, and spend that; free it comes and easy it goes. The vast proportion of the people who are clamoring for a change in conditions are those who are the least affected by them.

The condition confronts us, however, and we have got to meet it; there is no question about that. I myself am loath to believe—although it may be true—that we are exporting more foodstuffs than are needed across the sea. If so, of course, it means profiteering is being indulged in because of the attraction of increased prices in France, Great Britain, and other European countries. It ought to be stopped, and I think that this administration will stop it.

I know of no reason why they can not stop it under existing laws, for, if I remember our food-control law—and I remember it fairly well—the administration is given almost autocratic power to control the distribution of foodstuffs. Certainly no legislation is needed in that regard; but the inquiry may be entirely pertinent.

If anybody is unduly charging and making extraordinary profits in the dispensation of the necessities of life at this time, that man is an enemy of his country. That is a pretty serious statement, Mr. President, but I make it deliberately, because in the present fevered condition of public opinion any man who ministers to it deliberately and voluntarily, I do not care how the ministration is effected, is for the time being, although he may not know it, an enemy of the public order, and therefore of this country. I have not a particle of doubt that such conditions exist; nor have I any doubt that the administration, through the Department of Justice, will discover those men. I hope they will and bring them to book, because nothing in the world will so serve to enforce rigidly the restrictive conditions of a statute as the imposition of the penalty which it sanctions. If that is done, it ought to, and I think will largely, satisfy the sentiments of those who now feel that they are suffering unjustly and unduly because the Congress hesitates or is afraid to enact legislation which, in their opinion, will regenerate the world.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have listened with very keen interest to the able remarks of the Senator from Colorado. Let me say that since I have been a Member of the Senate there is no Senator on this floor who for knowledge of public questions and ability to make a clear exposition of his position upon public questions has impressed me more than the Senator from Colorado. I have great respect for his opinions and views; but I differ from him on this question in this respect: During my public career, if I have found one thing more than another that has tended to influence the people in opposition to our institutions and our Government, and to arouse discontent and doubt as to whether or not we have the right kind of Government, it is the fact that they feel that in emergencies our public officials do not respond to their demands.

During the war with Germany this Government showed to the world and to its own people that it could respond when it set out to do it. When we stood for patriotism and for America and forgot party lines and divisions we accomplished things. Bill after bill was passed by the Senate after only two or three days of deliberation and consideration. Now we are not fighting Germans, but we are fighting discontent in our own country, and we are face to face with serious unrest. The people want us to do something, and I suggest that there is one way that I have seen since I have been here by which things can be accomplished, and that is for the leaders of both political parties to agree upon a policy. There is hardly a bill that can not be passed through both branches of Congress in 24 hours if the leaders of both parties meet and agree to it. The very thing that the Senator has suggested about what is taking place in the Committee on Agriculture shows the need of party cooperation. We all know that when it appears in issue here that the farmers are on one side or the other, each political party takes a position pro or con, determining their position as to whether they can get the farmers' vote or not. I think that this question is beyond votes, beyond party, and that the best way to guarantee to the American people that we are in earnest, that their public officials note this unrest and desire to stop these strikes, is to announce that we propose to face this issue; we propose to pass all legislation necessary, and to do it at once. That is why I suggest that there could not be any act I can conceive of that would guarantee that security better than if it were announced to-morrow in the press of the country that so important did Congress consider this issue that the steering committees of the Republican and Democratic Parties for the first time in years, except during the war, had met together to agree upon a program, to agree upon pushing to the front all legislation which will tend to reduce the cost of living to the American people. What could be fairer? What could bring confidence to our people better than this? And there is need of confidence.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the high prices are the result of scarcity, of extraordinary exports, or of combinations and monopolies in restraint of trade?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In my opinion the high prices are due primarily to the worst condition of criminal profiteering that any country has ever seen in recent years. I think when the evidence is made public as to the terrific amount—millions and millions of dollars—of profits that have been made by manufacturers and producers of foodstuffs in this country we will have all we can do to satisfy our people that they are living under a Government which can protect them and will protect them.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think—if I may be permitted another inquiry—that the profiteering has gone to the extent of violating the criminal statutes of the various States and the criminal statutes of the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In my opinion, the present law is not sufficient to meet the present situation. I do think it goes very far to meet it. I note that certain Members upon the other side of the Chamber take the position that there is nothing to do; that there is enough law upon the statute books, and that the violators of law ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, then, there is a disposition upon the part of manufacturers to extort money from the people by high prices and by combinations. If that is true, since nearly all of the States have very strong statutes, drastic statutes, against restraints of trade and trade monopolies, why do not the State officials, who are right in contact with these evils, bring into effect the statutes of their States? Why do not the State officials of Massachusetts and of Connecticut and of Rhode Island, where large manufacturing plants exist and where, as I understand the Senator, these combinations exist, invoke the State statutes? Why do they always come to Congress for relief when they have relief at home, if these high prices, in part at least, are the result of combinations and monopolies?

It seems to me that the State officials are lying dormant. They must be moribund. The only two States that I have read of recently that are taking any steps at all to enforce the criminal statutes against combinations and against monopolies are the States of New York and Ohio.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The statements of both the Senators—and I say this most respectfully—reinforce just the argument that I make. The people hear us say: "Why do you not do this? Why do you not do that? Why do you not prosecute? Why do you not go to the separate State governments?" The Senator well knows that the government of some States is in the control of these profiteers, and there is no hope of remedy from that source. The people come to their National Government, as they came here when we were at war, and found the officials of the Government willing to cooperate and try in every possible way to bring victory and success to our arms, and they have a right to come to us in these hours of peace and ask us to meet this very serious problem and this very serious condition.

I note, also, that the opposition, or the suggestions that there is little that can be done or that we ought to go elsewhere, came from colleagues upon my side of the Chamber; so I am further convinced that it is not a party issue at all. I want that made clear. I say that the Republicans are as patriotic as the Democratic Members are. It is not a party question; but we do too frequently divide here upon party questions, and any man who heard the message of the President 10 days ago knows that unfavorable comments were made simply because these words came from the mouth of a Democratic President. What I ask is, if that is the case, that we give notice to the country that we can not do anything; that it is our Attorney General, it is our State governments, that are responsible; that Congress can not do anything. Let us declare it, not by one Senator's speech but by a unanimity of action here, so that the people will not look further to us. Then they can look for some other remedy, somewhere else. But if we have a remedy, if we can assist, I ask that we show the proper spirit and quell this discontent. Go home to your own State of Utah, Senator, or to Colorado, and every person you meet upon the streets will ask you, "What are you doing in the Senate? What is being done by Congress?" It is true, as the Senator from Colorado says, that it is difficult to do. People are turning to their Congress; and are we to tell them that we are powerless; that there is no remedy here; that there is no law that can be passed by this Congress; that our doors are closed to them; that they must find a remedy in some other branch of the Government, or outside their Government; that it is a condition we are not able to settle?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has referred to conditions in my State. I interrupt him to say that I have received a great many letters from my constituents, and almost every one of them suggests a remedy, and no two of these remedies are alike. Some of them are diametrically opposed to each other. Here, again, I can not possibly comply with all of their requirements.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I repeat, if the political leaders in this Chamber and on the other side of this building meet to-morrow they can within 24 hours pass every law that the President asked to have passed 10 days ago; and every Senator knows that such action has been taken repeatedly during the days that we were at war with Germany.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if he is in favor of passing every law recommended by the President?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not, either.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; I expect to be opposed to many recommendations that the President makes; but I do say that I love my Government to the extent of not wanting the people to turn against it because its public officials refuse to hear their murmurings and their pleadings. They are with outstretched hands asking for help and for relief. This is the condition in this country to-day. Every government that has ever been overthrown has been overthrown because of its public officials' failure to respond to the hopes and aspirations and wishes of the people. This is getting to be the situation in America. Have we the power, have we the disposition, have we the inclination to meet this situation?

That is why I join with the Senator from Tennessee when he says the people want action; and I have suggested a way of action. There is not a Senator here that can dispute me. Let us have a meeting of both these steering committees. Instead of endeavoring to find out how the farmers, or the manufacturers, or the employers of the men in industries feel, let us say that this is such an important American issue that we are going to solve it no matter where it hits or whom it hurts. This is the way to meet this issue, in my opinion; and I am very glad to have an opportunity of discussion by Senators here, and want to apologize for taking so much time, although I do not believe I need to apologize. I have not thrust my opinions upon this body very much during the short time I have been here. But I do want to find out if it is possible to get this body to act; and I do want to express here the sentiment that is widespread and sweeping across this country: "Can our Government help us? Is there ever going to be an end to the increased cost of living?"

Strikes, strikes, strikes everywhere—against what? Not for more wages, but for money to meet the bills that come pouring in on the housewives of America every day and every hour; not for more wages, but to pay for the cost of sleeping and living, of clothes and food for children and men and women. That is what the strikes are for. That is what the cry is.

Are we powerless? Are we helpless? If we are, let us say so. Let us tell the people the truth. Either we can not or we will not find a remedy. If there is a remedy, let us give it to the people, and let us put it first on the program of action here each day and agree to study and work over this problem in daily session until we settle it. This will put an end to the unrest and restore confidence in our own institutions and our own Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the impassioned speech just made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts did not point out any remedy, as I interpret his remarks, to meet the condition of which he complains.

I do not want him to assume from the very quiet and modest questions which I propounded to him that I was expressing an opinion one way or another upon this important question. I do not want him to think that the questions I propounded were designed to convey my views upon the question of high prices or the manner of dealing with the same or the authority of Congress to deal with this question, although I will say frankly that I think the views of many of the people as to the power of Congress to control prices and regulate the activities of the people are fallacious and do not rest upon scientific or economic grounds or historic precedents. It has become the fad nowadays when some evil, real or fancied, exists in the country to rush to the Government of the United States for relief. Legislative enactments are the panaceas for all our industrial and political ills; the philosophy of cause and effect is discarded; the operation of natural laws in economics, in the sociological field, is to be set aside, and hastily written laws are to remedy conditions which result from world-wide influences.

The doctrine is taught that all power is in the Government, in officials and bureaus and the thousands of employees of the United States, and that in some mysterious manner they can heal all infirmities of the social and political organism and drop blessings and prosperity upon the people. This doctrine is an anachronism; it has no place in the political formula of this enlightened age. Freedom and progress and prosperity are the fruits of the individual and result from individual initiative and growth and development. Governments and officials are not fairy godmothers showering gifts upon the people. We must learn the lesson that economic and social progress rest with the people; that liberty and progress result from strong individualism and are found in governments that are free from autocracy and paternalism. Germany was indurated in the belief that the State was the source of power and that the individual existed in order to glorify the State. This view inevitably produced a strong military government in which there was communicated to the social and political structure the same spirit which in the end developed an autocracy and a bureaucratic tyranny.

It should be understood that conditions often arise which legislation can not prevent, and evils appear which enactments can not cure. War changes the currents which carry the world. These changes of currents profoundly affect the lives of the people. The political and economic and social conditions are frequently revolutionized. The effort during the period of war is to create in order to destroy. Life and prosperity—everything we have—we lay upon the altar of sacrifice. War works destruction and ruin and produces consequences which are ineffaceable. Laws can not bring back the billions of dollars in effort, in human energy, in property, which the great struggle through which we have just passed demanded, neither can it put life into the forms of the heroic dead who sleep beneath the blood-stained soil of European lands.

There have been four years of waste; four years during which millions of men were withdrawn from industry and the fields of production and were engaged in destruction. During these long and tragic years millions of men were killed and greater numbers were maimed and rendered incapable of again entering the fields of industry and production. Capital and savings to the extent of billions were destroyed, and ruin and desolation came to many peoples. The world became a huge war machine to turn out men to fight and to be killed, and to produce shot and shell and engines for human destruction. We are now facing the inevitable results of a world conflict—lands devastated, homes destroyed, the accumulations and savings of years of thrift and frugality wasted; Europe a charnel house, her industries paralyzed, her economic life overwhelmed, her people exhausted and still suffering from the shell shock of war. And we must add to this record the further fact that poverty, bankruptcy, and starvation exist in many of the countries of the Old World. And this mighty Nation, while not suffering as other nations suffered, is staggering under the burdens which the war laid upon it.

The causes making for high prices in Europe exist, though perhaps in less acute form, in this country. No human agency could have prevented high prices following the war. Rulers could have promulgated edicts, Congresses and Parliaments could have legislated until their laws filled volumes, still prices would have increased and industrial and social conditions would have been unstable.

The reaction from this war was bound to produce serious conditions and national and international disturbances. It would be wise, if we could realize this fact and appreciate that the period of transition from war to peace will call for the highest patriotism, statesmanship, and courage upon the part of political leaders and the utmost charity and sanity and common sense upon the part of all the people. This is no time for the preaching of discontent or the application of radical experiments. The swollen tide of war will not subside in a day nor in a year. The normal streams of life can not flow steadily until the mighty inundation has subsided. We must watch and wait, and with patience and wisdom address ourselves to the conditions surrounding us.

Self-initiative must not be weakened or destroyed; the people must not lose faith in themselves, in their own power and virtue, and in their competency to work out their salvation. This is the test of a great people.

The problems of the hour call for courage, splendid individualism, capacity for self-government, and the assertion of those glorious attributes which have so conspicuously manifested themselves in those who laid the foundations of this Nation as well as those who have preserved it until this hour.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], when I came into the Chamber a moment ago, was detailing some of the factors to be considered when legislation is proposed having for its object the reduction of commodity prices. There is no division of sentiment upon the part of legislators, as well as all thinking people, as to the results which are desired. All are anxious to get back to a peace status as soon as possible. All admit that the prevailing world prices are too high, and that the pyramiding of wages and commodity prices must, if persisted in, end in disaster. There are honest doubts as to the causes of present conditions and as to the measures necessary to effectuate relief. That there is profiteering in many circles and fields of activity I am convinced. Avarice and cupidity are too often the aftermath of war. The moral sensibilities of some are blunted by war, and they seek to profit at the expense of others when patriotic and altruistic individuals are seeking to bring peace and tranquility to a disordered world. I have no doubt but what there are manufacturers, and traders, and brokers, and middlemen, and retailers, and "captains of industry" who are indifferent to the serious situation of our country, and their calloused souls fail to respond to the calls of conscience. There are perhaps some agriculturists, some in the ranks of labor, who also are profiteers, and who are making the task of bringing society back to the safe paths of peace and prosperity infinitely harder.

Monopolies and combinations to restrain trade and production and to increase prices should be punished. The robber should be punished though he wears the respectable habiliments of a "business man." I am in favor of any legislation that will promise results. But I am apprehensive of some of the nostrums suggested up and down through the land. There must be production, and still more production. If the farmers, fearing that they are to be denied a fair profit upon their labor and investment, cease to produce, then want and starvation will peer into our homes.

In the schemes proposed for relief from high prices, care must be had not to discourage production. Punish those who dam up the streams of trade and commerce, who by combinations or illegal methods increase prices; but in every legitimate way encourage greater production and increased physical and mental effort to produce.

However, it is impossible, in my opinion, to immediately bring prices down to prewar conditions. The immense volume of currency in circulation not only in our country but also in the world, the imperative demands of Europe for our raw materials as well as our finished products, together with the shortage occasioned by the war—these and many other causes conspire to maintain a high level of prices for an indefinite period. If we were to contract our circulating medium, reduce the base of credit, cease to export to feed and clothe the starving and naked people of Europe, if we could stimulate production in the face of falling prices, then we might very soon realize some of the benefits so eloquently alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says that some of the benefits which the Senator from Massachusetts looks for would be experienced, perhaps, by contracting the currency. I want to suggest to the Senator that the most disastrous and widespread panic and the most serious suffering among men and women of every degree of affluence or the lack of it has been in times of contraction rather in times of inflation.

Mr. KING. The observation of the Senator is pertinent in this connection. The conditions after the Civil War illustrate the evils of a too rapid contraction of the currency. It can not be done without bringing upon us greater evils than those from which we are now suffering.

I sympathize entirely with the situation as it has been depicted by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is regrettable that conditions are as we find them throughout the world; and yet, bad as they are here, we do not suffer as the people are suffering in Europe and in other parts of the world. If prices are high here, they are much higher in Europe.

I say again that some of the conditions existing to-day can not be changed by fiat of Congress. Doubtless there is some legislation which Congress has the authority to enact that will ameliorate conditions. But as I have stated, the return to peace conditions will be a slow and somewhat painful process. The patient does not pass from a serious illness through the period of convalescence and back to perfect health in a day. It requires weeks, and in some instances years, to effectuate a perfect cure. The world has been sick socially and economically and industrially, sick from autocracy, sick from militarism, sick from the horrors of war. It needs a wise and skillful physician; it requires courage and faith and the spirit of sacrifice. The patient must exercise caution and prudence and observe the laws of health if it would again become sound and well and prepared to assume the responsibilities required at its hands.

If we will cease striking and produce more, that will prove one stepping-stone to improved conditions and to falling prices. One of the primary questions is work and production. Anything that will stimulate production will make for the reduction of prices. I repeat that if we cut off exports, if we reduce the circulation medium, if we practice the most rigid economies, then we will not long complain of high prices. If we will practice some of the economies that were observed during the war we will get back to normal conditions very much quicker; but as long as men are spending, as they are to-day, the greater part of the $50,000,000,000 that we earned during the last year, as long as we are spending it and not saving it we will have high prices.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator object to the first step being taken by this body to show that they are interested in this public question—that the steering committees of both political parties deem it of such importance that they are cooperating to give it first place in any program of legislation in this Chamber?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should welcome a conference of the leaders of both parties here, a conference of the leading committees, with a view to formulating such legislation as is within the power of the Federal Government, and calculated to remedy the evils of which the Senator complains.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will recall that I sought to point out the evils, the unrest, and the discontent, and suggested this as the first immediate remedy, so as to let the country know that we appreciate the condition, and that we were going to prepare to meet it, and meet it in a nonpartisan way, by the cooperation of all leadership here, and by forgetting for once, anyway, any party division upon this important question.

Mr. KING. I regret that I was called from the Chamber when the Senator first addressed the Senate this afternoon, and I do not have the advantage of the remarks which he then made. I was addressing myself with reference to the remarks which the Senator made the second time that he spoke this afternoon.

Mr. President, I think that every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House is desirous of doing everything that may be done under the constitutional power of the Federal Government. But I do think that it is not the part of absolute frankness and candor to convey the idea to the people that Congress is in a situation to bring about all of these changes which so many individuals are demanding. I am afraid that the public do not appreciate that we have just emerged from a great World War; indeed, the war is scarcely over; and that the effect of this war will last for an indefinite period.

I think that we should plead for patience and for patriotism upon the part of the American people; plead for an exhibition of the same stalwart Americanism now that they exhibited during the period of the war. Peace has its dangers and its problems, sometimes infinitely greater than those that confront nations during the periods of great wars. This is a time when the American people should act wisely and patiently, and should not indulge in hysteria or seek for empirical and experimental legislation and fly to every nostrum and every quack that appears in the land. The lessons of the past are replete with information. We can not by legislative fiat change human nature and change the conditions of society that have been set in motion through the operations of the World War. But I believe the American people are going to act prudently and patriotically. I believe that the spirit of unrest will diminish as the days go by; at least I hope so. I believe that we are Americans now as we have been in the past, and that the sinister movements in the land and the intrigues of Bolshevists and those who seek to destroy the foundation of society will come to naught. There is that stuff in the people of this land that will enable them to meet every emergency and the trials and the dangers encountered will only add to the glory of the victory when peace and justice shall finally prevail.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, August 20, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 18, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Lord God our Heavenly Father, the work of the past is done and passed into history. Whatever is good in it shall live, and the evil under the dispensation of Thy providence shall pass away.

But the work of the present and future looms large before us, hence we pray for wisdom to guide us, strength to sustain us, courage to inspire us to go forward with firm and steadfast purpose; that laws shall be enacted which shall tend to quiet the unrest prevalent throughout our country; that the normal may obtain—peace, prosperity, happiness reign. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 15, 1919, was read and approved.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. To-day being the third Monday in the month the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is in order. The Clerk will call the first bill.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—TO ENCOURAGE FOREIGN TRADE.

The first bill in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended, approved September 7, 1916.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

VETO MESSAGE—DAYLIGHT-SAVING ACT.

Mr. WINGO. Mr Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. What has become of the President's veto message on the daylight-saving law?

The SPEAKER. It is on the Speaker's table. It has been thought wise not to take that up until to-morrow, and consequently the Chair thought it better not to lay it before the House at this time, so that the vote might be had upon it to-morrow.

Mr. WINGO. It has already been laid before the House, has it not?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The point of no quorum intervened before the Chair could do so on Friday last.

Mr. WINGO. As I understood the Journal this morning, it contained a recital of the fact that the President's message had been received. I have no objection to the consideration of the message going over until to-morrow, but I think it should be done by action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is within the discretion of the Chair to lay it before the House when he pleases.

Mr. WINGO. Surely the Chair does not want that announcement to stand—that the Chair has discretion, in the matter of a presidential veto, to lay it before the House when he pleases?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been so advised. To be quite frank about the matter, there is some doubt about a quorum being present to-day, and the Chair thought it better that the message go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WINGO. I have no doubt about that; but the proper thing would be for the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to ask unanimous consent that further consideration of the President's veto go over until to-morrow or until such time as he desires. I have no objection to that; but I do not want the RECORD to show that a President's veto message was received and that we proceeded with other business, without any consideration, as the Constitution requires. I have no objection to its going over, and I suppose the House has no objection. The reasons for its going over are apparent; but the Journal, as read, shows that the message has been received.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must know that it is not obligatory upon the House to take up the President's message immediately upon its receipt. He knows that as well as anyone else.

Mr. WINGO. It is not obligatory on the House——

Mr. MADDEN. Then, why does the gentleman make so much fuss about it?

Mr. WINGO. I am not making as much fuss as the gentleman. It is not obligatory on the part of the House, except so far as the Constitution places an obligation on the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think we ought to take it up until we get enough Members here from the West to pass it over the President's veto.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose, if the President's veto message is presented to the House to-day, to move a reconsideration of the bill to-morrow. It is my purpose when the message is placed before the House to-morrow to move immediate reconsideration of the daylight-saving bill.

Mr. WINGO. What objection has the gentleman to asking unanimous consent that further consideration go over until to-morrow?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no need for unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody has to make any motion to reconsider. It is an automatic performance.

Mr. MONDELL. There are three distinct motions that can be made relative to the President's message. I simply desire to notify the House that so far as I am concerned the motion to refer it to a committee will not be made, and that it is my present opinion that the daylight-saving bill should be reconsidered to-morrow. Of course, something might occur to render it advisable to delay consideration for a day or two.

Mr. WINGO. I think myself that it ought to be considered at a time when Members are present, but I do not want the Journal to show that the veto message was received from the President and that then the House proceeded in violation of the mandate of the Constitution, which requires consideration by the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It does not require immediate consideration.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, it does; though the word "immediate" does not appear.

Mr. MADDEN. The House proceeds every day with messages coming from the President, which goes to the Speaker's table, and pays no attention to them.

Mr. WINGO. Not veto messages.

Mr. MADDEN. Any kind of a message. It does not take them up until such time as the House thinks it is proper to consider them, and there is no sense or reason for asking unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of it.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, the gentleman's understanding of the Constitution may be just as unreasonable and senseless and foolish as he thinks the constitutional requirements to consider when the veto is received.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reconsideration of the bill, in view of the President's message, will be taken up to-morrow morning, unless at that time there should be some very urgent reason for postponing its consideration.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can not an arrangement be made to refer it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that committee can report it back whenever it is deemed expedient?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it has been understood that the bill will be taken up to-morrow and reconsidered, in view of the veto message.

Mr. HAUGEN. Some of the Members are out of the city, and everybody ought to be given an opportunity to be here.

Mr. MONDELL. Members have all been notified that the House was going to begin to do business and a quorum was necessary here this morning and from now on, and notice has been given on each side of the House to that effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think there is any sense of referring it to the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Nobody wants to refer it to the committee. Everybody knows how they are going to vote on it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the proceeding.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that the veto message from the President of the United States is on the table, and that under the practice and rules of the House and the constitutional provision the House should proceed to consider it. I move to postpone further consideration of that bill until to-morrow.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman can not do that with a point of order pending.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point of order that the gentleman can not make that motion while a point of order is pending.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The first point of order that the gentleman makes is, as the Chair understands it, that a veto message of the President having been received by the House it must be acted upon before any other business is considered. Is that the point of order?

Mr. WINGO. That is the point of order, and that it is a privileged matter. There is no question about its being a privileged matter. We will get action one way or the other.

The SPEAKER. There is no question in the mind of the Chair that it is a privileged matter.

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection to entering into an agreement to consider it at a future date. My own desire was not to ignore it, in face of the constitutional requirement that we "shall proceed to reconsider it."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the President's message go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the President's message be considered to-morrow. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WINGO. May go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. I withdraw my point of order, as the action of the House just taken by unanimous consent, I think, meets the requirement of section 7, Article I, of the Constitution, which provides that when the President does not approve a bill "he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider." Previous Speakers have ruled that a motion to defer as well as one to refer are "allowable within the constitutional mandate that the House 'shall proceed to reconsider.'"

My only desire is to preserve orderly procedure and duly observe the mandates and plain provisions of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FORWARDING AND RETURN OF MAIL MATTER OF SECOND, THIRD, AND FOURTH CLASSES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6951) authorizing the return to the sender or the forwarding of undeliverable second, third, and fourth class mail matter.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this bill to return to the sender bulky mail matter, such as catalogues, newspapers, magazines, and so on, whenever not delivered, sending them across the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. There are two kinds of mail matter contemplated in the bill. The first is fourth-class matter of a perishable nature and of obvious value. It may be forwarded to another post office or, if undeliverable, returned to the sender, charged with the forwarding or return postage. This under such rules as the Postmaster General may prescribe. The second provision would cover second, third, and fourth class matter, including catalogues, and authorizes the forwarding or return of such matter, charged with the forwarding or return postage, provided that the sender when he sent it originally placed on it a pledge to pay the forwarding postage or return postage in case it is forwarded or returned.

Mr. ELSTON. This return will not be at the expense of the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. The language of the bill is, "may be forwarded to the addressee at another post office." Does the word "may" mean the word "shall"?

Mr. STEENERSON. In the first clause of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Well, anywhere in the bill. It runs all through the bill, the word "may." Does that mean "shall"?

Mr. STEENERSON. It does not mean shall in the first part of the bill, because that is determined by the Post Office Department, as to whether it is of obvious value. It is a matter they have to determine——

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to know. It says that if it is of obvious value it may be forwarded to the addressee at another post office. Does that mean "shall"?

Mr. STEENERSON. Of course, the word "may" is often construed the same as "shall."

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but what I wanted to get at is what is intended in the bill. Does it mean—I suppose this was drawn in the Post Office Department?

Mr. STEENERSON. It was drawn in the Post Office Department, and I think it means simply conferring authority on them to do so. It hardly would require it in case they would feel that it ought to be done.

Mr. MANN. It does not mean, then, that it may be forwarded at the request of the addressee? He will have nothing to say about it?

Mr. STEENERSON. The addressee? The first-described matter does not require any direction whatever. The Post Office Department, under the rules and regulations they prescribe, will forward it, if it is of obvious value and perishable nature, either to another address or return it to the sender. But the matter described in the second clause of the bill must bear the pledge of the sender.

There is at present no provision for forwarding or returning without prepayment of forwarding or return postage any mail matter except letters (R. S., 3940; 3939 as amended; 36 Stat., 630). The word "letters" is construed to include all first-class matter in the case of forwarding, all except postal cards in the case of returning (Postal Laws and Regulations, secs. 595, 633). Undeliverable perishable mail matter is at present turned over to municipal authorities for distribution to hospitals, and so forth (Postal Laws and Regulations, sec. 636).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution No. 167, making the provisions of section 2296 of the United States Revised Statutes applicable to all entries made under the homestead laws and laws supplemental and amendatory thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask that some one in charge of the resolution advise us of the necessity for the passage of the resolution under the present form?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the present law, section 2296, reads as follows:

> No lands acquired under the provisions of this chapter shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor.

That has been the law for the last 50 years in regard to homesteads. It is a question, and some of the courts have held it does not apply to the enlarged homestead. The matter was taken up with the Secretary of the Interior, and he thought that rather than to introduce another resolution we should take the one that the committee had reported. The committee has considered the matter and reported this resolution, and given all homestead claims upon the bills enacted since section 2296 was enacted the same right. We have the 320-acre homestead; we have the 640-acre stock-raising homestead; and so that they might all have the same protection the present resolution is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this resolution in form seems to be a mere construction of a statue. The provisions of section 2296 of the Revised Statutes have been and are applicable to all entries made under the homestead laws.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. Now, the law does not so provide. Why does not the form of the resolution state that they are hereby made applicable? That is making law.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I introduced a resolution, as suggested by the gentleman. The department came back twice recommending each time the passage of the resolution that is now submitted, and the committee has adopted this resolution. Therefore I accepted the statement of the Secretary of the Interior in preference to what I thought in regard to the facts.

Mr. MANN. It is a rather bad habit to take the suggestion of some clerk in the Department of the Interior for the form of a bill. The clerks are not very reliable about such things. I suppose the intention is to make this relate back and cover some case that has already been disposed of under the existing law, probably to affect rights already acquired adversely. Of course, you make law by construction, but it is not a very good way in which to make law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the meantime, so that there may be no question of the propriety of passing it in this form, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will be stricken from the calendar.

The Clerk will report the next business.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution remain on the calendar and go to the foot of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that the resolution just objected to——

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, if it is to be called up again to-day I shall object.

Mr. RAKER. No, sir; not to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I will not object.

FRATERNAL SANITARIUMS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1125) to authorize the Secretary having jurisdiction of the same to set aside public lands to be used as national sanitariums by fraternal or benevolent organizations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of learning from the proponents of this bill the necessity, if there be any necessity, for the passage of a bill of this kind at this time; whether or not there are any organizations desirous of using this unoccupied land for sanitarium purposes, and the benefits to be derived therefrom?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before Congress for the last three years. House bill 16029, Sixty-third Congress, passed the House unanimously. It was reported out favorably by the Senate but failed to pass because of the congestion of business. The necessity for this legislation is that the Masonic fraternity, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Owls, the A. O. U. W., and others are requesting that this legislation be enacted, and that they severally desire to locate homes and places upon the public land where the climate is salubrious and proper, to the end that their members may be cared and provided for. That is the object and purpose of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. GARD. Could not these organizations apply and acquire by purchase the proper amount of ground for these sanitariums?

Mr. RAKER. There are places in the public domain which can not be bought, because the Government owns them. The places are ideal for these hospitals and sanitariums, particularly for consumption and other diseases, that they may be located away from the populous centers, and where these organizations desire to provide for their members as they are doing in other places.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I understood the Government thought that Dawsonsprings, Ky., was about the best place.

Mr. RAKER. Well, if private organizations and institutions take the Government land and pay for it and put up sanitariums for the purpose of protecting and providing for their members, without any expense to the Government, clearly there should be no objection. That is the object and purpose of this legislation.

Mr. DENISON. I understand there is lots of land around Dawsonsprings upon which other sanitariums could be put for these organizations. I understand it is cheap.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would this privilege include the Grand Army?

Mr. RAKER. It would. It was so understood and was so considered by the committee when this bill was under consideration.

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not find that the Grand Army or the Spanish-American War Veterans are said to desire to establish a hospital on public lands, and for that reason I ask the gentleman if the Spanish-American War Veterans and the Grand Army and other institutions of that kind would be included within the scope of this resolution. Is it the gentleman's construction that they are included?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I think they are included.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have read the report accompanying this bill, and I see in it letters from the Secretary of the Interior and some others whose opinions have been asked respecting the bill. But I see here no report from the Secretary of Agriculture, who has charge of the national forests. The Secretary's opinion was asked, was it not?

Mr. RAKER. It was. The gentleman from Michigan now raises the objection on the other side that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raised, because we took the department's construction of the bill. It has been my contention in the Committee on Public Lands that the committee could draw bills, but the committee, practically unanimously, held that we should get the department's form of the bill, regardless of what we might draw, and therefore in this particular legislation the committee thought it proper and wise to use any part of the public domain where it could be used for the purposes here designated, and they acted accordingly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is true, is it not, that the report of the Secretary of the Interior was favorable if certain amendments were made?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and we made them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And the report of the Secretary of Agriculture was unfavorable, but the Secretary's letter does not appear in the report. Will the gentleman tell me why?

Mr. RAKER. I did not think it was necessary. In further answer to that, some of us have lived in and about the national forests longer than any men in the Department of Agriculture, and they know that if you can put a sanitarium in one of these national forests or other places, where one of these organizations can put a hundred or two hundred men and keep them and give them a new lease of life and practically cure them, it ought to be done.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman has not answered the question why the favorable letter from the Secretary of the Interior was included in the committee's report and why the unfavorable letter of the Secretary of Agriculture was not included.

Mr. RAKER. I will answer that frankly. I am not always in the habit of furnishing what the others say adversely to me. The committee acted, and I thought that sufficient in this instance. I would make the report for the committee in the same way it was made last Congress.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I supposed it would be the purpose of the gentleman to give the House all information available from the departments, and not a one-sided report.

Mr. RAKER. I am going just as far as I can to meet the views of the House, and since the gentleman has asked me what was the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture on that proposition I will say that the House once before unanimously passed a similar bill, and the committee has twice reported it out favorably, and therefore I adopted this course, which I believe was proper and right.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman will pardon me. One of the amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Interior and assented to by the committee was the insertion of the word "unreserved" in line 7 on page 1, so that these locations could not be made on reserved lands if under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. But as to the land under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture, selections and locations can be made upon lands that have been reserved for particular purposes and are under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. RAKER. May I answer the gentleman's question on that?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. This reserved land relates to parks and places of that kind, where neither the committee nor anyone else would want to put a sanitarium. The lands we had in mind are forest reservations, some of them in extent larger than many of the States, and the committee believed, basing their judgment upon the wisdom of those who lived in and about these places, that it would not in the slightest degree affect the forest reserves, and use should be made of this land where it will not affect the reserves in the least degree.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If this resolution should become a law it would permit the taking of areas of land which were purchased under the Weeks Act, better known as the Appalachian lands, acquired by the Government for particular purposes. If it should be the wish of any of these organizations to acquire and devote to their own use some of those lands they could be acquired. Is not that true?

Mr. RAKER. I think it would be.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Bringing it right down to brass tacks, will the gentleman consent to the elimination of the words, on lines 8 and 9 of page 1, "or lands on forest reservations"?

Mr. RAKER. If anybody should object, of course, the bill would go over. I would rather not, but if the gentleman insists upon it I must.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman will accept that amendment, I shall not make an objection to the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman inform the House of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture about this matter?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I looked for it in the report of the committee, but I do not find it. But I have a copy of the Secretary's letter to the chairman of the commitee, and it is unfavorable.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman read it, if he has time?

Mr. MANN. It is a long letter.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It covers about four pages of closely typewritten matter. It contains lots of good reasons for opposing the bill unless it be amended. I still reserve my right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that this is the same bill that was pending in the last Congress. Is that correct?

At that time, when the bill was reported, I examined it and it seemed to me that it ought to have been referred to the Secretary of Agriculture. As there was nothing from the Secretary of Agriculture in the report, I took the liberty myself of referring it to the Secretary of Agriculture and asked for information on the bill; and in reply I was sent a copy of a letter which the Secretary of Agriculture had sent to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, addressed to the committee. I thought then, and I think now, that it was a breach of good faith to report the bill back to the House favorably without including in the report a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture giving the reasons why, in his judgment, it should not pass. I am surprised that a committee of this House, having referred a bill to the head of a department, and having received a letter giving information upon the subject, should decline to give it to the House for the information of the House because the committee did not agree with the reasoning of the Secretary of the department. It is a lack of good faith to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly, if I have the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In the first place, I want to say that I very largely agree with what the gentleman says, but I do not think he ought to criticize the committee. I do not think my good friend from Oregon, who does not seem to be on the floor just now, should be held up to criticism.

Mr. RAKER. He ought not to be held up to criticism. I will answer that clearly.

Mr. MANN. The House has the report from the committee. The committee adopts the report. The House has a right to rely upon the report of the committee, and when a committee has information of that kind and refuses to submit it to the House, it tries to take advantage of the House.

Mr. RAKER. The committee does not desire to take any advantage of the House. The committee desires to present fully to the House all the information it has.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The House never would have known from the report of the committee that the Secretary of Agriculture had been asked his opinion upon the bill and had given very good reasons, as it seemed to me at the time, why the bill ought not to pass in its then form and in its present form. That is a matter of opinion, but it is not a matter of opinion whether a commitee having information about a bill fails to give the information to the House because it does not agree with the opinion of the committee. It is a matter of good faith to the House.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. ELSTON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. McARTHUR. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ELSTON. I should like to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman will consent to the amendment which I suggest, then I will not object; otherwise, I will.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The bill is stricken from the calendar.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CAREW, for one day, to attend the funeral of Hon. Edward J. Gilmore, of New York City.

BRIDGE ACROSS PERDIDO RIVER, NUNEZ FERRY, ALA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1362) to authorize Hiram I. Sage, a citizen of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Perdido River at or near Nunez Ferry.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask why it is that the bill authorizes the maintaining of a toll bridge? What is the necessity for that?

Mr. ESCH. The general bridge act of March, 1906, which gives the consent of Congress to the construction of bridges, does not designate the character of the bridge. It may be a railway bridge, a highway bridge, or a bridge on which tolls are exacted. I do not know the local situation with reference to this particular bridge, but it is not unique in that respect. The committee heretofore has reported bills authorizing the construction of bridges of this character.

Mr. GARD. I was asking more immediately about the particulars of this bridge. Can the gentleman advise me about the Perdido River and the necessity for allowing a toll bridge to be constructed at this point?

Mr. ESCH. If there is any gentleman from Alabama or Louisiana present, he can give that information better than I. I sent word to Gov. SANDERS, of Louisiana, that this bill was coming up, but I understand he is not on the floor.

Mr. GARD. I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. ESCH. It can be passed temporarily, until Gov. SANDERS comes in.

Mr. GARD. I ask that the bill be laid aside until the author of the report [Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana] is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POSTAL SERVICE IN HAWAII.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7972) to improve the administration of the postal service in the Territory of Hawaii.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is hereby directed to establish in the Islands of Hawaii, under appropriate regulations to be prescribed by him, such branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of Honolulu as in his judgment may be necessary to improve the service and as may be required for the convenience of the public: Provided, however, That such branches, nonaccounting offices, and stations shall be conducted under the name of the existing post offices affected so as to maintain the identity of the offices concerned.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is approved by the Post Office Department as one which will facilitate the improvement of post-office service in Hawaii. Existing law requires that every post office must make its report to Washington. The distance is so great to Hawaii that it is believed by the Post Office Department that it will greatly facilitate the transaction of business to have Hawaii report to Honolulu, the capital of Hawaii. If there are any questions to be asked about it, I would yield to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE]. If not, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DRAINAGE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3175) authorizing local drainage districts to drain certain public lands in the State of Arkansas, counties of Mississippi and Poinsett, and subjecting said lands to taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the author of the bill or those having charge of it to advise the House of the necessity for a change in existing law, so far as this particular bill is concerned.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to make subject to the provisions of the law of the State of Arkansas certain unpatented lands in the counties of Mississippi and Poinsett. All these lands lie along either the Little River or the St. Francis River. They are wet and unsuited to cultivation. The drainage districts have been established in that State and they seek to reclaim all of these lands and make them suitable for cultivation. Quite a large body of land lies in Mississippi County and in Poinsett County, next to the lake and near the river. The people who have gone upon these lands for the purpose of making homestead entries have asked that this bill be passed. If it is passed their lands will be included within the drainage districts and reclaimed. If the bill is not passed their lands will be left outside the improvement district and will be perfectly worthless. Therefore, at the request of the people who are to be affected, the bill was introduced and has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and so far as I know no objection of any sort has been urged to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I notice that in the communication from the acting Secretary of the Interior, of date May 25, 1918, he suggests a redraft of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and this bill is the redraft. This is the bill that the Department of the Interior wishes. I introduced a bill following very closely after the reclamation act affecting lands in Minnesota. The department said there had been some administrative features of that bill that had proved not satisfactory, and it wrote this bill and sent it down and the committee accepted it.

Mr. GARD. Has there been any report on the bill since May 25, 1918?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. The report is of date July 29, 1919.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Have entries been made upon these public lands?

Mr. CARAWAY. Practically on all of them. On part of the lands no entry has been made. Most of the lands, however, are in the possession of entrymen?

Mr. BARBOUR. To what extent are the lands not in possession of entrymen?

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall have to guess at that—possibly 1,000 acres, maybe 1,500, and it might not be more than five or six hundred.

Mr. BARBOUR. How would the drainage district seek to collect that tax from the Federal Government if the Federal Government did not pay it? Would it sell the land?

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill itself provides that the lands may be sold as lands are sold where they are under private ownership because of failure to pay the betterments.

The only restriction affecting these lands is that the land must be sold to some one who is qualified to make an entry and in tracts not larger than 160 acres.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the Secretary of the Interior approved this bill?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of those unentered, unreserved public lands, and all of those entered lands for which no final certificates have been issued, within the areas hereinafter described, are hereby made and declared to be subject to the laws of the State of Arkansas relating to the organization, government, and regulation of drainage districts to the same etxent and in the same manner, except as hereinafter provided, in which lands held under private ownership are or may be subject to said laws: Provided, That the United States and all persons legally holding unpatented lands under entries made under the public-land laws of the United States shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, and benefits given by said laws to persons holding lands in private ownership, said lands being those public lands in Mississippi County, Ark., in townships 14, 15, and 16 north, range 9 east, and townships 15 and 16 north, range 10 east, fifth principal meridian, according to the official surveys thereof approved October 12, 1915, and all of those unentered public lands, and all of those entered lands for which no final certificates have been issued in Poinsett County, Ark., in townships 11 and 12 north, range 6 east, fifth principal meridian, according to the official surveys thereof approved July 30, 1913.

SEC. 2. That the construction and maintenance of canals, ditches, levees, and other drainage works upon and across the lands subject to the operation of this act are hereby authorized, subject to the same conditions as are imposed by the laws of the State of Arkansas upon lands held in private ownership, and that the cost of construction and maintenance of canals, ditches, levees, and other drainage works incurred in connection with any drainage project under said laws shall be equitably apportioned among all lands held in private ownership, all unentered public lands, and all lands embraced in unpatented entries affected by such project. Officially certified lists showing the amount of charges assessed against each smallest legal subdivision of such lands shall be furnished to the register and receiver of the United States land office of the district in which the lands affected are situated as soon as said charges would become a lien if the lands were held in private ownership.

SEC. 3. That all charges legally assessed pursuant to the drainage laws of the State of Arkansas by a drainage district against any unentered public lands, or against any lands embraced in unpatented entries, subject to the provisions of this act, shall be a lien upon said lands, which may be enforced by sale in the same manner and subject to the same conditions, except as hereinafter set forth, under which said charges shall be enforced against lands held in private ownership, and whenever any of said lands shall be sold for nonpayment of such charges, inclusive of lands bid in for a drainage district, a statement showing the name of the purchaser, the price at which each legal subdivision was sold, the amount assessed against it, together with penalties and interest, if any, and the cost of the sale, and the amount of excess, if any, over and above all lawful assessment charges and the cost of sale, shall be officially certified to the register and receiver of the United States land office of the district in which the lands are situated immediately after the completion of such sale, but nothing in this act shall be construed as creating any obligation on the United States to pay any of said charges.

SEC. 4. That all moneys received from the sale of entered or unentered lands subject to the operation of this act which shall be in excess of assessments due thereon, together with penalties and interest and the costs of the sales, shall be paid by the proper county officer to the receiver of the United States land office of the district in which the lands are situated, and such excess moneys shall be covered into the United States Treasury as proceeds from the sales of public lands.

SEC. 5. That at any time within 90 days after the sale of unentered public lands and at any time within 90 days after the expiration of the period of redemption provided for in the drainage laws under which the lands are sold, no redemption having been made, after the sale of lands embraced within unpatented entries, the purchaser at such sale, a drainage district being herein expressly excepted from the operation of this provision, shall, upon the filing of an application therefor and an affidavit containing proof of necessary qualifications with the register and receiver of the United States land office, and upon payment to the receiver of the price of $5 per acre, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry of lands under the homestead laws, be entitled to receive a patent: Provided, That such purchaser shall have the qualifications required in making entry of lands under the homestead laws, and any such purchase shall exhaust any further homestead right of the purchaser to the extent of the amount of lands thus purchased by him. Not more than 160 acres of such lands shall be sold and patented to any one purchaser under the provisions of this act. This limitation shall not apply to lands subject to the operation of this act which may be bid in for a drainage district, but no patent shall be issued to a drainage district or to any one bidding in said lands for a drainage district. The proceeds derived by the Government shall be covered into the United States Treasury and applied as provided by law for the disposal of the proceeds from the sale of public lands.

SEC. 6. That unless the purchaser shall, within the time specified in section 5 of this act, file with the register and receiver of the United States land office an application for a patent, together with the required affidavit, and make payment of the purchase price, fees, and commissions as provided in said section 5, any person having the qualifications of an entryman under the homestead laws may file an application for a patent, together with the required affidavit, and upon payment to the receiver of the purchase price of $5 per acre, fees, and commissions, and in addition thereto an amount equal to the drainage charges, penalties, interest, and costs for which the lands were sold, and if the lands were bid in for the drainage district, an additional amount equal to 6 per cent per annum on the sum for which the lands were sold from the date of such sale, said applicant shall become subrogated to the rights of such purchaser and shall be entitled to receive a patent for not more than 160 acres of said lands. When payment is made to effect subrogation as herein provided, the register and receiver of the United States land office shall serve notice upon the purchaser that an application for patent for the lands purchased by him has been filed, and that the amount of the drainage charges, penalties, interests, and costs of the sale will be paid to him upon submission of proof of purchase and payment by him of said sums. The receiver shall make such payment as soon as said requirement shall have been fulfilled. If the lands were bid in for a drainage district, the receiver will pay to the proper county officers the amount of the drainage charges, penalties, and interests and costs of sale, together with the additional sum of 6 per cent per annum, to which said drainage district is entitled. All remaining moneys to which the United States may be entitled shall be covered into the United States Treasury and applied as provided by law for the disposal of the proceeds from the sale of public lands.

SEC. 7. That a copy of all notices required by the drainage laws of the State of Arkansas to be given to the owners and occupants of lands held in private ownership shall, as soon as such notice is issued, be delivered to the register and receiver of the United States land office of the district in which the lands are situated where any of the lands subject to the operation of this act are affected, and the United States and the entryman claiming under the public land laws of the United States shall be accorded the same rights to be heard by petition, answer, remonstrance, appeal, or otherwise, as are given to persons holding lands in private ownership, and all entrymen shall be given the same rights of redemption as are given to the owners of land held in private ownership.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be effective as to any lands involved in suits instituted on behalf of the United States with a view to quieting title in the Government to such lands until and unless such suits shall be finally determined in favor of the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "drainage," insert the words "and road."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that it was the intention to amend this bill so as to make all of its provisions applicable to road improvements as well as to drainage improvements, and I would suggest the amendment "and road" be inserted after the word "drainage" throughout the bill. I move to amend, on page 2, line 22, by inserting the words "and road" after the word "drainage."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: On page 2, line 22, after the word "drainage," insert the words "and road."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear the amendment read, and we could not hear a word that the gentleman from Arkansas stated in reference to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: On page 2, line 22, after the word "drainage," insert the words "and road."

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to remake my statement? On page 1, line 8, after the word "drainage," the committee inserted the words "and road," to make it read "drainage and road districts."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman this?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Are drainage and road districts distinct, or is there a drainage and road district?

Mr. CARAWAY. They are distinct districts. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will state there is a general law in Arkansas under which people may organize improvement districts for the purpose of draining the land or for building public highways. And the purpose of this act is to make these lands subject to the betterment charges for both road and drainage districts.

Mr. MANN. Well, we have heretofore passed laws relating to lands in Minnesota, and possibly elsewhere, giving the right to make assessment charges against the property owned by the district for drainage purposes. Have we heretofore anywhere, so far as the gentleman knows, given such a right for road purposes?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure we have not, sir.

Mr. MANN. Well, this is a distinct departure?

Mr. CARAWAY. It is, sir, if the gentleman will permit me. Our State has recently made provision for about $80,000,000 worth of highway improvements, and, what is strange, the people who are to pay this assessment to build these roads seem to be willing to be taxed for that purpose, and these lands that are to be reclaimed would be denied the right to go into improvement districts that seek to build hard surface roads.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is very strange. People often seek the right to organize districts and issue bonds for public improvements, but I think it would be very strange if the people with pleasure pay the taxes for these bonds issued for these roads long after the roads are worn out. That is what they will be doing. However, the people of Arkansas at the present time will feel good but when they finally pay for these improvements they will cuss the men who authorized them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, anyway, they have not the improvements and until they get them they believe they want them.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is not the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas rather inconsistent with the purpose of the bill since the amendment provides for the cost of construction and maintenance of roads, whereas the language of the bill in section 1 and section 2 provides merely for the construction and maintenance of canals, ditches, levees, and other drainage work?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; in section 1 it says in line 8, "and roads."

Mr. GARD. Drainage and road districts, not roads. I would suggest that the gentleman proceed with the bill as it is rather than seek to incorporate the cost of construction of roads in this bill when manifestly it was not intended so to be done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, of course, I have explained to the gentleman the bill as originally drawn provided merely for drainage reclamation.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to object to the consideration of the bill, but I shall object to a vote upon the bill unless the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I remember, the time for the gentleman to object is gone. He can vote the amendment down if he can.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is too late to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does not the gentleman think, in section 2, that if this amendment is adopted the amendment also should follow after "drainage," in line 17, section 2?

Mr. CARAWAY. I have marked the places where is should go in.

Mr. ROMJUE. If the gentleman will read that section——

Mr. CARAWAY (reading)—

That the construction and maintenance of canals, districts, levees, and other drainage work upon and across the land subject to the operations of this act are hereby authorized.

And so forth.

It would have to be so amended. I want to say this to the House: Primarily the bill, as I have said over and over again, is to get reclamation for the purpose of drainage alone. At the request of the people who were interested I undertook to have it amended. I am vitally interested that it shall pass with reference to the drainage, and I should very much like to see it pass with roads included. If there are any gentlemen on the floor who are certain they know more about what the people down there in Mississippi and Poinsett Counties need and want than I know, where I was raised, why, God bless their souls, they can amend the bill. I have no earthly interest in it except to try to record the wishes of the people there and to give them a chance to develop lands that are absolutely useless now, and will be entirely useless especially if they are not included in the present reclamation projects that are now going on, because they are in such narrow strips it would be impossible after the levees have been constructed and the ditches dug to make another drainage district to include them. They could not carry the cost.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

I think this bill is very similar to the bill that passed in relation to lands in Minnesota, introduced, I think, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. CARAWAY. It was called to my attention, and the department said there were certain administrative features of law that did not work well, and it was changed in that respect.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota tells me that this situation arose in Minnesota, that where the ditches were dug spoil was thrown over to one side, where it could be used for making a road. But in some cases I think the assessment was defeated because they smoothed down the spoil and made a road. It may be the purpose of inserting "road" here is not to organize a separate road district as stated by my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], but to authorize the drainage district to construct a road out of the spoil, which would seem a very desirable thing to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was not the object of the legislation, because that soil is so soft you can not build the road that way. I wish it were possible, but you can not do it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, what is purposed under this bill in the matter of drainage is provided for by the act approved August 11, 1916, in connection with lands requiring reclamation by irrigation. And I wondered why some of the provisions of that bill of August 11, 1916, were not followed in this bill, and particularly in the matter of the laying of obligations on the public lands, and, second, of the disposition of the public lands after the levy has been made and the lands have been sold. Under the irrigation act I have referred to no public lands may be subjected to liens contemplated until the Secretary of the Interior has approved the plans of reclamation and has satisfied himself that the work is feasible, and that the public lands that it proposes to place the lien upon are lands that may be properly brought within the area of reclamation. There are very good reasons for that provision, because without a provision of that kind there is a temptation, even if everyone connected with the enterprise is very conscientious and very conservative, to include in the area public lands the reclamation of which is questionable and by including them spread the cost over a larger area and make it to appear to be less than it actually is per acre of the lands that can be actually reclaimed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the first place, I am frank to say that I was ignorant of the provisions of the law to which the gentleman refers. In the next place, there is no temptation to do that in this case, because it costs money to include these lands, and unless they are subject to be reclaimed they will be absolutely worthless after being included, as they are worthless now, and therefore the people who are to pay the expense of this reclamation—every dollar of it—would be throwing their money away by including land that could not be reclaimed.

Mr. MONDELL. Not necessarily. If people were not entirely conscientious, or if they were over-optimistic, they would be tempted to spread their contemplated or proposed or suggested reclamation over a large area, with a view of appearing to make the cost per acre low.

Now, if a part of the burden could be permanently attached to lands that are not actually reclaimable, that would be a relief to the people who own the lands that can be reclaimed, or if that were not possible, and I realize that it would not be an easy thing to do, there is at least a temptation to make the project appear to be feasible and inviting, when, as a matter of fact, the facts may be otherwise.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. To start in with, these projects are already established. The assessments have been made. It is a question of whether these lands shall be included or not. Therefore that temptation is gone. The next provision of the bill is that the Government does not have to pay one cent. The only way it could get anything would be to sell the lands; and if the lands were not reclaimed, it could not sell them for 5 cents an acre. And, therefore, if the people who are to pay for the reclamation, whose lands are to be charged with the betterments, would go out and spread this betterment or this apparent reclamation over lands that were entirely worthless, they ought to be in a home for the feeble-minded, because they would be fooling nobody but themselves and laying no burden on anyone but themselves.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, now, that may be true in this particular case.

Mr. CARAWAY. In this case it is.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not true by and large, and it is because it is not true that the committee having to do with the law that provided for the levying of the cost of irrigation reclamation on public lands was very careful not to place any such temptation in the way of irrigation promoters.

One thing more: I am fairly well satisfied, although not entirely so, with the statement made in regard to the situation in this particular case. But I want to make one other suggestion to him. He may be entirely right. I do not clearly understand the purpose of the provision of section 5, page 4, which lays a flat charge of $5 per acre on the public lands when entered.

On what theory was any charge placed on the public land more than their proportionate share of the burden? And, assuming that it be wise and proper to place a sale price on those lands over and above their burden of reclamation, why was the price fixed at $5 per acre?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlemen permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman will permit, the net charge of $5 an acre was put on it by the department here. The provisions of the bill, if the gentleman will read it, provide that where the lands have been reclaimed and they are not entered they may be sold for the cost of reclamation. The department said that the Government ought to have something out of it, and so it arbitrarily said that as a condition of your getting a patent, after you pay the betterment charges, the Government shall have $5 an acre out of it. It is not worth a cent, and never has been, for any purpose in the world except to hold the earth together, and the department said that after you had gone in and paid all the betterment charges, before you get a patent you must pay the Government $5 an acre. I do not think it ought to have been, but rather than argue with the department I accepted the department's view.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. These lands affected by the bill are confined to one county in the State of Arkansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. No. They are in two counties—Mississippi County and Poinsett County.

Mr. ELSTON. What is the total acreage of the lands?

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman will read the description he will get that. I do not recall it.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, in general the land lies in swamp areas along a river?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. So that the reclamation and drainage contemplated are intended to take the water off the land, which is probably alluvial land of good quality, so that it may be cultivated?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman contend that after all the reclamation and drainage are done, and the land made fit for cultivation, it is worth only $5 in addition to the drainage or reclamation cost?

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, now, I do not know. I am not going to assert that or to deny it. I do not know what it will be worth after it is reclaimed, and I do not know what it will cost to reclaim it.

Mr. ELSTON. In general, what will be the figure for its reclamation, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know. It requires the building of a high levee and innumerable ditches; how many I do not know.

Mr. ELSTON. Twenty-five or thirty dollars an acre?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I am sure it will be that much.

Mr. ELSTON. Then $5 in addition to that would probably make good rich valley soil purchasable by this preferred applicant at $30 an acre. Does the gentleman think that is fair?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me to use just a moment of my time now?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit just a question?

Mr. MONDELL. The ordinary price of public land is $1.25. Here one is supposed to give $4 additional.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; this land has lain there for nearly a hundred years, and nobody has been found silly enough to take it.

Mr. MONDELL. What the gentleman from Arkansas says, I think, answers the inquiry of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] to a certain extent at least. This land has been subject to acquisition by anyone desirous of utilizing it since the morning stars sang together, and it has been subject to the homestead law since the year 1864, and no one has seen fit to take it; and I think it may be a fair assumption that the land is probably worth a little more than the cost of reclamation, if it is worth the cost of reclamation; and that is why I inquired why the charge is $5 an acre rather than the usual $1.25 per acre, where a title is granted without full compliance with the homestead law. I assume that it is upon the theory there may be some little unearned increment there which the Government ought to have, and it may be partly on the theory that under the law the purchaser, while he must be a qualified homestead entryman and exhaust his homestead rights by using it on this land, receives a patent immediately upon the purchase and without the necessity of the usual homestead residence, and that is a privilege for a release from an obligation which has some cash value. It is possible on that theory that the price is fixed at $5, an arbitrary price of $5, rather than $1.25.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is possibly true.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand from this colloquy that the land is now subject to entry to anyone who wants to go on it and take it. Is that true?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. It is not reserved or withdrawn?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. ELSTON. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to the effect that the price shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, substituting for the price of $5 an acre a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I tell you, if you are going to reclaim this land and try to sell it, there ought to be no strings tied to it.

When the purchaser goes in and pays the betterment charges, he ought to know for what price he will get it.

Mr. ELSTON. The Secretary might fix a price.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and possibly it might be prohibitive.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Why was not the price fixed at $1.25 an acre, the same as arid land, when reclaimed under the desert-land law?

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. In the absence of some safeguard, such as is contained in the previous legislation, what would hinder the owners in this case from including within these boundaries public land that did not need reclamation?

Mr. CARAWAY. Because, to start in with, there are no such lands in that country. That would be a complete answer.

Mr. McPHERSON. The gentleman admits that Congress has not prevented the possibility of fraud that would include other lands?

Mr. CARAWAY. I only answered the gentleman's question halfway. I said there are no such lands, and therefore it is an impossibility. In the next place, the drainage promoters, as the gentleman calls them, have absolutely no interest in it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Who lays out the boundaries of the drainage district?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I am going to tell you. The people who are to be affected, whose lands are to be reclaimed, get together and form a drainage association and go before the court and have a drainage district established. There is not a dollar of profit in it to anybody. It is just simply a question of reclamation. There are no public funds for anybody to handle, nothing for anybody to get, no issuing of stock or paying of dividends. They all go in and pay whatever it costs to reclaim their lands and assess it among themselves.

Mr. McPHERSON. One more question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. Does the gentleman mean to say it is true that under the drainage law no lands can be included within this district except such as are petitioned by the owners to be included?

Mr. CARAWAY. I never intended to say that. If I said it, I did not intend to. I said that the districts are established by landowners. Nobody else has a right to participate in this organization, because it costs nobody else anything. They get together and file a petition in court and give notice that they are going to ask for an order of the court to create a drainage district; and when the hearing comes on the owners of all the lands that are sought to be included are notified. If they are included in the district, they can appeal that question if they want to. Then, if they are included, when the assessments of betterments are made by assessors, who are appointed by the court, notice is given, and they have a right to contest the amount of their assessment. But what I did try to say was that it was not a profit-creating concern. There is no reason why lands that can not be reclaimed and can not be valuable should be included, because if they can not be reclaimed and can not be made to yield revenue you would be enlarging your district at an expense and getting back nothing out of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. I have had some experience in reclamation districts, and I am somewhat concerned as to what may happen to the Federal Government if it goes into this district, if this district is like some others with which I have had experience. Will the Federal Government have a right to vote upon district matters?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no.

Mr. BARBOUR. Do the landowners within the district have the right to elect the trustees of the district?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. BARBOUR. Who governs or controls that?

Mr. CARAWAY. The court appoints the commissioners, and after the commissioners are appointed to fix the boundaries of the district then assessors are appointed who assess the benefits.

Mr. BARBOUR. Are the assessors appointed by the court?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the landowner a right to appear before the court and object?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Object to any assessor?

Mr. CARAWAY. He has a right to object to everything. He has no right to go before the court and say, "I want John Smith instead of Bill Jones to assess the betterment"; but if there is any reason why the court should not appoint any man as an assessor, anybody would have the right to object to him, to show that he was not competent, or that he was not honest, or that he was interested in the result, or anything of that kind.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then, as I understand, the district is organized or founded by an order of the court?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. BARBOUR. And I notice here that the bill provides that the maintenance of the reclamation work shall be paid for by the lands public and private within the district?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is true. The assessments for that purpose are referred to the court.

Mr. BARBOUR. And the benefits received by the owners of the various tracts of land are determined.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it. The assessors divide the lands into 40-acre tracts, or smaller as the case may be if they are city lots, and then they assess the betterments against them. The owners of the land are notified that their assessments have been made, and that they may come into court and show that they have been overassessed if they can.

Mr. BARBOUR. And the United States Government would have the right to come before the court the same as the owner of any private tract?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. And to show that the assessment placed on the Government land is excessive?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course; but if you will look at the provisions of the bill you will see that the bill provides that the ownership shall pass out of the Government as soon as the district is created, because whenever the betterments are assessed the Government lands are sold for the payment of these betterments, plus $5 an acre, which goes into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BARBOUR. These questions occurred to me after hearing the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that some power or control over these should be reserved in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Secretary of the Interior is to have no interest in it, because so soon as the betterments are assessed——

Mr. BARBOUR. The lands are to be sold.

Mr. CARAWAY. The lands are to be sold and will pass into private ownership.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to say earlier in the discussion that these lands in the main had been entered.

Mr. CARAWAY. Most of them have.

Mr. MONDELL. And, as a matter of fact, entrymen would then appear on their own behalf as any other owner would.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. And the only case in which the provision to which the gentleman has referred would apply would be a case where the land was not entered up to the time that the assessments were levied—and there are not likely to be many cases of that sort—or cases where the entryman, for some reason or other, fails to perfect his entry.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. If the situation is a fairly reasonable and favorable one, I assume there will be very few of those cases.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the land has any value at all, I am sure some one will enter upon it, because he can do it up to the day of sale.

Mr. MONDELL. And the entryman that now occupies the land will, of course, protect himself, as any other owner would, and would proceed to pay his share of the assessments as any other owner would?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. I would like to say this: I was asked to introduce this bill by the commissioners who were to establish the district. I declined to do that until every man living upot it had requested that it should be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] stated that he did not know how much acreage owned by the Government was covered by this bill. It does not seem to be in any of the letters in the report. As I understand, these are a part of the so-called "sunk" lands of Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. They are very valuable if they can be drained.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; extremely so; and absolutely worthless unless they can be.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, of course these lands are in connection with private lands. Private lands can not very well be drained without the draining of the Government lands, and the Government lands can not be well drained without the drainage of the private lands. It is perfectly proper that the two should be combined in forming a drainage district. The letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior states, quoting, I think, from the language of the petition that was filed—that the lands in their present condition are unfit for cultivation and will remain so until drained; that they will be very valuable for agricultural purposes when drained and their value will be greatly enhanced.

Even in my short time I can remember when lands down in Illinois before they were drained sold for $15 or $20 an acre after I became a voting citizen. Those lands are now worth four or five hundred dollars an acre. These lands when they are drained will be extremely valuable. They are bottom lands and are very rich. The cost of drainage is fairly high, but I take it it will be far less than the value of the lands when drained. I think it is a good scheme for the Government to join with the other owners in Arkansas in the drainage of the lands, but I question very much whether the Government ought to give the lands away. That is what is being done by this bill. Of course, a few people will be benefited. They will get lands worth $50 to $100 an acre, or perhaps more, at an expense of $25 or $30 an acre or perhaps less, perhaps more; I do not know. The lands will be worth a great deal more, and it is idle to say that these lands have been there since day first dawned and that no one has cultivated them. Since they sank, a good many years ago, they have not been subject to cultivation and are not now and will not be until they are drained. But I suppose the Government will go on and make the lands especially valuable by some particular act of Government and then give them away.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have more than 60 men here when doing public business, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point. If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] wants to conduct business with 60 men present, it is his affair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think 60 intelligent gentlemen in the examination of the details of a bill constitute a fair average attendance in the House under the circumstances.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas has withdrawn his point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. As I look over the assemblage and see the leader of the minority here——

Mr. BLANTON. He is always here.

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] present, as well as other distinguished gentlemen, I am sure that the gentlemen who are here are fully qualified to transact the business before the House in an intelligent way.

I want to take the time of the House for only a moment in regard to some suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has just taken his seat. These lands have had a curious history. At one time a large portion of them was granted to the State of Arkansas as swamp lands, and the State sold them. Then a claim was made by the Federal Government that the survey under which the grant to Arkansas was made was erroneous. We had a resurvey of the lands and they were taken from the original claimants under the State and opened to homestead settlement. Since the beginning of settlements in that particular part of the world these lands have been open to entry, freely open to entry. We tried to get rid of them by giving them to the State of Arkansas. Up to this good hour they have been of very little use to the world except to occupy a portion of the surface of the earth and to hold mother earth together.

It is proposed to reclaim them. Nobody knows whether or not the lands when reclaimed will be worth very much more than the cost of reclamation. In any event, they are in the main now held by settlers who could get a patent to them without the payment of a dollar to the Government. But this bill enables the State of Arkansas to bring these areas within its drainage laws. The only fear I have in a case of this kind is not that the people of the country as a whole may not get a few dollars of the earned or unearned increment, but that by no possibility no obligation shall be placed on the Federal Government with reference to these lands. And that seems to be guarded against in the bill; and that being done, I think that we ought to favor a piece of legislation which simply places the unpatented lands on the same basis as the patented lands; and in addition to that lays an obligation on the purchaser that he shall have the qualifications of a homestead settler and shall pay $5 an acre. I think it is a very fair proposition.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman favor the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas to include the construction of roads in addition to canals, ditches, levees, and so forth?

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am going to strike out that in deference to the gentleman from Ohio, who knows so much more about it than I do. And I now, Mr. Speaker, move, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the committee amendment, "and road," and leave it purely a drainage proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. The Chair understands the gentleman from Arkansas means that he does not desire that it shall be adopted?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARAWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRATERNAL SANITARIUMS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. In regard to the bill that was up some time ago pertaining to national sanitariums. I ask unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar and go to the foot, not to be considered until the next regular calendar day.

The SPEAKER. Which bill is that?

Mr. RAKER. The bill is H. R. 1125, No. 31 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, which was stricken off the calendar, be allowed to remain upon the calendar and go to the foot. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I call the attention of the gentleman from California—I do not know what line it is, but on the upper part of page 2 of the bill, where it speaks of societies, institutions that may avail themselves of the benefit of the bill having the right to have sanitariums on the land referred to being organized for no profit, would not the gentleman accept an amendment there so as to provide that these societies not only shall not be organized for profit but shall be maintained and conducted without profit?

Mr. RAKER. That particular amendment was placed by the Senate Committee on Public Lands at the request of Senator Works, and when the bill comes up the matter can be discussed then. Of course, it can not come up now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman will appreciate that the bill does not provide against the society that notwithstanding its being organized for no profit it may be maintained and conducted at a profit.

Mr. RAKER. I shall be pleased to take up that question with the gentleman when we come to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill should have a complete report, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE ACROSS SUSQUEHANNA RIVER, PA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8117) for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania a bridge, with approaches thereto, across the Susquehanna River at Falls, Wyoming County, Pa., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania" and insert "maintain, and operate"; page 1, line 6, strike out the word "with" and insert the word "and";

page 1, line 7, after the word "at," insert the words "a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near"; page 1, line 8, after the word "Pennsylvania," strike out the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa."

On motion of Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House for a change of reference of the bill H. R. 8423, providing additional compensation to certain employees of the Post Office Department for overtime service, and the bill H. R. 8424, for increased compensation for postal employees during the current fiscal year, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I have conferred with the chairmen of both committees and it is agreeable to them to have that transfer made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for a change of reference as stated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I think we should proceed with the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE ACROSS CUMBERLAND RIVER, TENN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8076) authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] the character of this bill, as to whether or not it is to be a toll bridge and what is the general necessity for the building of it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that this is to be a free bridge, constructed by the county and for the people of the county. They have already voted $500,000 to build it. There is no bridge there now at or near the city of Clarksville. The Cumberland River runs through the county, and it is very important to have this bridge. It is a matter that has been agitated for many years there to have a bridge across the Cumberland River, so that the people on the south side can reach the city of Clarksville.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object for the purpose of asking a question, is this bridge to be built by any $55,000 Clemenceau roosters?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. This bridge is to be paid for by the money that has been appropriated by the people of Montgomery County, and it is to come out of the county treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8076) authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Montgomery, Tenn., be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Cumberland River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation and within a distance of 7 miles from Clarksville, Tenn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," and approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCREASED PRICE OF SHOES, SUGAR, CLOTHING, AND COFFEE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House resolution 217, directing the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into the proposed increase in price of shoes, sugar, clothing, and coffee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Federal Trade Commission very recently reported, after what was, I suppose, a very careful and painstaking investigation relative to the cost of shoes, the shoe trade, shoe business, shoe prices, and I imagine that most Members have received copies of that report. Evidently the Federal Trade Commission was busily engaged in that sort of an inquiry some time before this resolution was first introduced.

It occurred to me as a little peculiar that those who had to do with the inquiry—the committee that considered it—do not seem, so far as we are informed, to have sought information from the Federal Trade Commission as to whether they were conducting any inquiries along those lines. About the time that the matter was here for consideration, a few days ago, the Federal Trade Commission suddenly burst upon us with a preliminary report on shoes. There can, of course, be no possible objection to securing all the information that is obtainable in regard to the price of shoes, leathers, and all those things that enter into the cost of shoes. It is a tremendously important subject, a subject that affects us all in these days. One of the most trying of the increases in the cost of living has related to shoes and other footwear. There has been a greater increase in that character of commodities than in almost any other. Many of us have believed that there was no justification for all that increase, and the report of the commission would seem to indicate that that is true and would seem to further indicate that the Government ought to get busy and punish those who are responsible unlawfully for these increases in cost all along the line.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The report the gentleman refers to only covers shoes. It does not cover the other articles mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has amended the resolution as it is now before the House. The report of the committee will leave the resolution applying only to shoes, and I assume that those who are supporting the resolution are in favor of the adoption of the committee amendment, and I suppose the committee desires the resolution adopted in that way, and undoubtedly the committee has a purpose in so amending the resolution. The committee has, as a matter of fact, since this resolution was reported, reported another resolution relative to inquiries into sugar.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. So I assume that it is the purpose of the gentleman who introduced the bill and the gentleman who reported it to support the resolution in its amended form.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman referred to the report of the Federal Trade Commission. That report as presented is a preliminary report, or, rather, a summary of the report. If the gentleman has read it, he will learn that as to the manufacturers' cost and the financial end of the business, the investigation brings it down to include 1917 and some of the retailers' costs for 1918. The purpose of this resolution as originally introduced was to get at what is proposed for the future as well as what had already taken place, but now the report submitted does not include the increased costs for the last year and a half, which have been very great.

Mr. MONDELL. I did read the preliminary report very carefully, and I noted that while the conclusions were assumed to be based on present conditions, the facts referred to were mostly facts of a year or more ago. And I have assumed that the Federal Trade Commission is not engaging in so useless and profitless an undertaking as to make an examination and a report to Congress without bringing the examination as nearly down to date as possible. If that was not the object of the Federal Trade Commission, what was their object and purpose in giving us this preliminary and proposing this final report?

Mr. IGOE. I do not know what the object of the commission was, but the object of this resolution is to get the facts now and get them promptly if they are to be of any value.

Mr. MONDELL. I do hope and trust that out of the resolution there will come some real definite information based on facts. It will be a welcome novelty to many of us to have a Government agency thoroughly examine into and fully and fairly and intelligently report down to date the facts with regard to a situation.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. McARTHUR. Does the gentleman think the Federal Trade Commission can fully and fairly and intelligently report anything?

Mr. MONDELL. I am willing to give the Federal Trade Commission an opportunity to demonstrate their ability to do that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object, I observe that as originally introduced the Federal Trade Commission is called upon by this bill to inquire into the increased price of sugar, clothing, and coffee, and report to the House at the earliest moment the cause and necessity for the increase. The committee reporting the bill strike out that provision. I desire to ask the introducer of the measure the reason for the elimination of that clause?

Mr. IGOE. Well, the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. DENISON] can probably explain that better than I can.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I hope he will.

Mr. IGOE. I have been anxious to get a quick report on some one article the price of which has gone up enormously, and I hoped that out of it we might be able to frame some legislation. That was the reason why the resolution was framed as it is, to get a report on shoes by September 9, and the other report at any later date, as soon as convenient.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, the inclusion of the inquiry as to the reason for the increased price of the other commodities would not have prevented the Federal Trade Commission from reporting upon shoes, and so I would like the gentleman reporting the measure to explain why that clause relating to clothing and sugar and the other commodities was eliminated.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, of course it is very desirable for us to have information on the prevailing prices of everything. But the committee that considered this resolution, of course, had to take into consideration the limitations that surround the Federal Trade Commission in the performance of its work, and our information was that the Federal Trade Commission is now engaged in investigations that are tremendous and far reaching, and that those investigations would so completely absorb its time that if we wanted to get anything definite and specific we had to limit the requests we were making of them.

Now, there was a resolution pending before our committee which the committee had at that time already considered asking for an investigation and report as to the prevailing prices of sugar. The committee had already had hearings upon that resolution and acted favorably upon it, and it is now pending before the House, so that that covers the question of sugar.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman says that is pending?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why is it not included here? Why does it not come up?

Mr. IGOE. I may say that the Senate has passed a resolution on sugar, and the Federal Trade Commission is now investigating that question.

Mr. ESCH. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has already reported out the Tinkham resolution, providing for an inquiry on sugar and the cost thereof.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How about clothing?

Mr. ESCH. It is not included in that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why not include that?

Mr. ESCH. I think this would be amply broad to engage the attention of the Federal Trade Commission for some time.

Mr. DENISON. What we want to get at is a report as early as possible. We can not expect too much from the Federal Trade Commission, so that in order to get something definite we limited this to the price of shoes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the life of me I can not understand why you should confine the attention of the Federal Trade Commission solely to shoes at this time, when the whole country is crying out against the increased cost of sugar and clothing and other commodities that enter into the necessities of life. I can not understand why some explanation is not offered now, when the opportunity is at hand, for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, eliminating this provision, that should go hand in hand with the inquiry concerning shoes.

Mr. DENISON. Well, I will say to the gentleman from New York that if he can not understand the very plain and simple statement I have made that is the misfortune of the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No. The gentleman has not made any statement that would give any reason for the elimination of that.

Mr. DENISON. I intended to.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman says the Federal Trade Commission is engaged with other matters. There is nothing so important at this moment, while the mind of the community is in such a state of awful unrest, as to bring to a head something that will result in the lowering of the cost of living, in the lowering of the cost of footwear, in the lowering of the cost of clothing and sugar, and other things that go into the necessities for life.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, we all understand the facts that the gentleman from New York states, but I thought I had a moment ago stated that we had already reported a resolution to investigate the prevailing price of sugar, and we had information to the effect that the Federal Trade Commission was so busily engaged that we could not expect it to make an investigation of the cost of everything, and, therefore, in order to get some tangible result, and get it quickly, we limited this resolution to an investigation and report on the price of shoes.

Mr. DYER. Can the gentleman tell how long it will take them to report on shoes?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know. They have already made a preliminary investigation, particularly as to the price of leather, and I did hope that they could supplement that inquiry and make a definite report at an early date as to the price of shoes. In the press of the country, particularly in the trade journals, there has been made public a prediction that the price of shoes is going to be enormously increased in the near future, and the committee thought that on account of the extraordinary price of shoes at present and the great importance of shoes to the people of the country we should call the attention of the Federal Trade Commission to that inquiry particularly and have a report on that subject as early as possible, and in order to do that we limited the resolution to the question of shoes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is right on that. I do not think there should be an objection to the inquiry. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. EMERSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Missouri asked for the regular order.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from Ohio will have an opportunity to discuss the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the inquiry, because the inquiry is proper; but——

Mr. DYER. The gentleman can offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 217.

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into the proposed increase in the price of shoes; to ascertain the cause and necessity for the proposed increase; to ascertain the manufacturers' cost price and selling price and the retailers' cost price and selling price for the years 1918 and 1919, and to report to the House not later than September 9, 1919, the result of the investigation.

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is further directed to inquire into the increased price of sugar, clothing, and coffee, and to report to the House at the earliest date possible the cause of and necessity for the increase.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 2 strike out the word "proposed."

In line 3 strike out the word "proposed."

On line 6 strike out the word "not," and on line 7 strike out the words "later than September 9, 1919," and insert "at the earliest convenient date."

Strike out all of lines 9 to 12, inclusive, so that the resolution will read:

"Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into the increase in the price of shoes; to ascertain the cause and necessity for the increase; to ascertain the manufacturers' cost price and selling price and the retailers' cost price and selling price for the years 1918 and 1919, and to report to the House at the earliest convenient date the result of the investigation."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is entitled to recognition if he desires it.

Mr. DENISON. I think I have said all that is necessary. I will be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I move to amend the resolution by adding in line 3, after the word "shoes," "clothing and food products."

Gentlemen may recall that three weeks ago to-day I made some suggestions that we should do something to reduce the cost of living. I was unmercifully abused for saying that. Since that time I have been back in my district and in consultation with the people there; and while shoes are very high, and I am in favor of an investigation of shoes, the people, just as the gentleman from New York has stated, are overwhelmingly in favor of this Congress doing something to reduce the high cost of living. It is up to this Congress to do so. We should enact some legislation along that line. If under this resolution the Federal Trade Commission can investigate nothing but shoes, let us eliminate shoes for the present and take up the food question. It is not a question of sugar alone; it is a question of meat and a question of potatoes. The executive branch of the Government is doing everything it can to dispose of surplus supplies of food to help the situation. Butter, eggs, cheese, meat, potatoes, and all food supplies are away up beyond reason, and there is a great outcry for either an increase of wages or a reduction in the prices of food products.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EMERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. What does the gentleman suggest as a remedy to reduce the high cost of living? Does he think an investigation will do any good? How will we accomplish it?

Mr. EMERSON. I think an investigation will help.

Mr. DYER. We have had a good many of them.

Mr. EMERSON. I am in favor of anything. As I said three weeks ago to-day, I am in favor of taking the tax off of food products. I am in favor of taking the tax off of the freight rates upon food products. I am in favor of the parcel-post system of distribution of food products. I am in favor of anything that will assist in any way in the reduction of the high cost of living; and if this investigation will assist in any way, I am in favor of it; but I would amend this resolution by including food and clothing as well as shoes, with the instruction that if a preference is to be given in any investigation it shall be given in favor of food, and that the Federal Trade Commission should first investigate the cause of the high cost of living and report to this Congress some legislation or some method whereby it can be reduced. It is up to us to do that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment that has just been proposed. The country is in a state of unrest. The people generally insist upon the Congress doing something real, something actual, something tangible toward stopping the profiteering that has been going on, as well as it can be stopped by legislation and lowering the high cost of living. The press has been proclaiming loudly against the profiteering and against the ever-increasing cost of food and clothing and shoes and other articles which are necessary for men, women, and children.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Not now, but in a moment I will. We have gone through expensive investigations by the Senate, House, commissions, departments, and bureaus, and the time has come when the people want something real done. I am glad this resolution now before the House is up for consideration. As I indicated before, I would have liked to have the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce report the resolution as it was introduced by Mr. IGOE. I realize that the Federal Trade Commission has much work to do, but it could report at one time as to shoes, at another time as to clothing, and at another time as to food, if it was expedient and proper to do so. I can see no earthly reason why the Federal Trade Commission should not be now instructed by the House to report as to the increase in the cost of clothing and food products. Why limit the inquiry to shoes? It is true that shoes are going up outrageously in price every day, until the price has become practically prohibitive. In fact in my city the price has risen to such an enormous figure that the people are sorely tiring of the condition, and the mind of the public has become so aggravated that no man can tell what may happen in the next hour.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman says the people are clamoring that Congress do something.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly. I am sure the gentleman knows that.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state to the House whether the people are clamoring that the President do something?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The people want the Congress to do something. Congress is invested with the power to legislate.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Can the gentleman suggest any legislation that is needed to authorize the President to proceed against all profiteers and the people who are responsible for the high cost of living?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That embraces a variety of things the discussion of which I can not enter into at the present. I agree with the gentleman who addressed the House just before I rose as to the things that may possibly go to help out the situation; but I am sure that some committee composed of the wise men of this House can formulate some legislation, and that, together with the reports that will come to us from the various bureaus and commissions, will enable us to pass practical legislation that will go to relieve the serious situation that now confronts the American people.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state that while our good friends from New York, during the past few weeks, have been enjoying their vacations——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have not been enjoying any vacation.

Mr. BLANTON. Who have lately come back here in order to be present on the question of the daylight law, I presume, the President of the United States has addressed Congress in the absence of some of our good friends from New York, and the administration has been at work for two weeks nearly on this very question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The administration is entitled to credit for what it has done. The gentleman is mistaken about the gentleman from New York having enjoyed a vacation. So far as I am concerned, I have worked.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman familiar with the report filed in the last week by the Federal Trade Commission concerning the price of shoes?

Mr. DYER. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have read the substance.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, in June, 1918, made exhaustive reports after extensive hearings upon the subject of the high cost of living, and recommended that the Department of Justice prosecute the five great packers in the United States for profiteering?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand that the Department of Justice is working to prosecute and punish the profiteers.

Mr. TINCHER. This report that I am talking about was filed in May, 1918. Is it upon that report that the gentleman understands the Department of Justice is now working?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What the specific foundation is I do not know. I trust that the amendment that has been offered will pass.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with keen interest to the discussion here of the proposed investigation of the cost of clothing, and I have some figures here of what it cost to manufacture an overcoat during the past two years which I desire to put into the RECORD. During the past two years the cost of manufacturing an overcoat has jumped from $10.85 to $22.62. The cost of tailoring an overcoat in 1917 was $3, the cost of tailoring in 1918 was $3.75. The cost of tailoring up to last Friday was $8. The cost of trimmings for an overcoat in 1917 was $2.85; in 1918, $3.82; in 1919, up to last week, $7.12. The cost of the cloth in 1917, taking 2¼ yards to make an overcoat, was $5; in 1918, $10; up to last week, 1919, $7.50; making a total cost for the overcoat in 1917 of $10.85, in 1918 of $17.57, up to last week of 1919, of $22.62. The itemized account is as follows:

It will be observed from the figures that I have read that the greatest increase has been in the amount paid for labor.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not mean that those are the union figures? He does not mean to say that the union scale of tailoring on an overcoat was under $5 any time in the last 10 years?

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, yes; it has been. I gave the union scale in 1917.

Mr. WINGO. The union scale prior to the war was $5 minimum for tailoring on an overcoat or a coat.

Mr. SIEGEL. That may be in the gentleman's district.

Mr. WINGO. And these are the union figures that the gentleman is giving?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes; they are. I will say for the gentleman's information that at a meeting held on Friday night in New York City the wages of these tailors were increased to the extent of $6 per week, and an agreement was made that there would be a further increase of $5 on the 1st of December.

Mr. WINGO. I know it was stated publicly since I became a Member of Congress, and I asked a tailor in Washington to verify it at that time. That was before the war. It was stated then that the minimum union scale of wages for tailoring was $5.

Mr. SIEGEL. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman who gave him the information——

Mr. WINGO. That was a public statement. I did not believe it, and I asked a tailor in Washington, who told me that it was true.

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, many people in Washington have always been in the habit of asking somebody to pass it out to them from time immemorial.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform the House what percentage of profit the retailer has added on to the cost of manufacture in 1919, as compared with the percentage of profit added on to the cost of manufacture in 1917 and 1918?

Mr. SIEGEL. An overcoat manufactured for $22.62 up to last week will be sold at retail for between $50 and $60.

Mr. BARBOUR. Who gets the profit?

Mr. SIEGEL. There are three people getting it.

Mr. BARBOUR. In the neck.

Mr. SIEGEL. Three people are getting the profit.

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, I thought the gentleman said "we people."

Mr. SIEGEL. I admit that we people are getting it in the neck as a rule.

Mr. WINGO. I understood the gentleman to be giving the cost of hand tailoring.

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, no; this is the cost of manufacturing.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, that is different.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to the percentage of profit made by the retailers in clothing lines? I assume he made some investigation along the manufacturing line.

Mr. SIEGEL. The gentleman will find that the profit is at least 50 per cent, and in many cases 100 per cent, from the manufacturer through the jobber and retailer to the consumer.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it not a fact that the retailer has added a much higher percentage of profit on the cost of manufacture in 1919 than he did in 1917 and 1918?

Mr. SIEGEL. He has to do it, because he is confronted with a complicated situation. The people demand the latest styles, and if the style of a garment is a few months old it will not be sold unless sold at a big sacrifice. Then he is confronted with the question of overhead charges in whatever place he happens to have his place of business, depending upon locality, and so forth.

Mr. EMERSON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to include clothing and food products in this resolution?

Mr. SIEGEL. Personally, I feel that if an investigation can be made quickly and results obtained quickly they should be included; but I have no particular faith in investigations merely as investigations. Personally, I think that a bill which I offered—some call it a drastic bill—providing that the cost price of each article be stamped on the article from the manufacturer and jobber and wholesaler down to the retailer, if passed, probably will correct the situation more promptly than would a lot of investigations at big expense. I have sufficient faith in the American people to believe that they are always ready and willing to allow every merchant a fair profit.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly I do.

Mr. ESCH. The bill that the gentleman introduced does not limit the operations to interstate commerce. What authority has Congress got over that subject matter unless it enters into interstate commerce?

Mr. SIEGEL. I assume that if we have authority to tax them in order to get a license, incidentally, too, we have authority to require them to state thereon the price of the article. We have exercised that power when we passed the drug act and the pure-food act.

Mr. EMERSON. I would say I would be in favor of the gentleman's bill if it was before the House; but this happens to be the only one that is before the House.

Mr. SIEGEL. This will only give an investigation, and that investigation will last a year or two. I want results, not more talk.

Mr. EMERSON. We can limit them.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. There is no time set in this resolution, and it will drag along and we will probably be in the same bad situation. However, I trust that the resolution as amended will pass.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do.

Mr. KING. The gentleman is an authority upon matters of this kind, and I would like to ask him if he does not think it would be a good plan for awhile to open up some of the Army commissaries for the sale of shoes and other articles to the people? I notice the price of blankets has been reduced by Goldstein up here from $1.50 to $2 after the sale here by the Government the other day.

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes; and I would like to see the Government commence to sell direct to the consumer every one of the articles in its possession throughout the whole country, and then you will see an immediate reduction in the prices.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I do.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman think this Government can consistently proceed against an individual or a firm for hoarding when we have been hoarding for nine months since the armistice was declared great food supplies, clothing, blankets, shoes, and so forth?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will answer the gentleman by saying that what occurred in the past is forgotten history. What we are confronted with at the present time is this, that the people of this country demand relief, and we have got to give them that relief swiftly. I do not contend for a moment that the Government's policy of a few months ago of meeting large manufacturers of foodstuffs privately and agreeing at that time to withhold those foodstuffs from the markets was an ideal thing for the average American citizen. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEN of Iowa). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself to this resolution, particularly to the matter of freight rates and the basis of the freight rates, which enter into the cost of shoes as well as all the other necessaries of life. I will not have time to do it in the few minutes which I desire to consume at this time, so I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, an important element of the cost of shoes and all other necessaries of life is the transportation cost. We have got, first, the cost of transporting cattle from the farm to the packing house, or when they are not carried directly from the farm to the packing house, the transporting of the cattle from the ranches where they are grazed to the feeding farms and from thence to the packing house. Then, when the cattle are butchered, we have the transporting of the hides to the tanner, and when the tanner gets through with them, then the transporting of the leather to the shoe manufacturer, and then of the shoes to the jobber and from the jobber to the retailer. So that the cost of transportation affects largely the cost of shoes, as well as of other necessaries, three or four times between the beginning of the raw material and the man who actually uses the shoes. No more important question is now before the American people than the settlement of the railroad question, which is now being considered by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, the entire country was greatly shocked last week by the sensational charges made by the representatives of the railroad employees of gigantic frauds perpetrated in the capitalization of our railroads. The charges voiced by Mr. Plumb, attorney for the railway labor organizations, were so sensational and far-reaching as to cause amazement from one end of the Nation to the other.

The charges made against the railroads involve not merely fraudulent capitalization but almost every form of common stealing. It was charged that not only has the capital of railroads been ballooned by false issues of stock and securities, but the railroads have been robbed of their assets through every form of big and little graft.

This is a matter of momentous concern to the people. Upon the capitalization of railroads are the people required to pay a "fair return" through transportation charges. Every dollar of fraudulent addition to railroad assets or debts means that a tax through rates must be levied upon the people to make that dollar good. Every dollar stolen from the railroads is a dollar stolen from the people of the United States.

The charges made against the railroads have the greatest significance, especially at this time, when the railroad owners are seeking to have Congress validate their capitalization and their debts by legislation. They are demanding of Congress a guaranty of an income upon their capital and debts. If Congress yields to their demands, the burden of all the frauds and stealing will be securely placed upon the shoulders of the people. There will be no hope for them to unload it in future. This is the big stake that the railroads are playing for. This is why they have carried on the most expensive propaganda in the history of our Nation, why they have bought newspapers and have poisoned all the springs of public information.

If the charges made by the labor representatives are true, Congress and the country ought to know it. If they are false, the welfare of the railroads themselves demands that they should be exposed. Congress can not legislate intelligently upon the railroad question without fuller knowledge on these subjects. If the charges are true, Congress must legislate having that fact before it. If they are false, we must shape our action accordingly.

For these reasons it is of the highest importance that a thorough investigation of the charges be made at once. The investigation must be made before any action is taken by Congress upon the pending railroad measures. We must either turn back the railroads to their owners without attempting to deal with the railroad question in any permanent way—turn the railroads back as near as may be as we received them—or we must know the facts upon these charges. It will be the greatest blunder in the history of Congress if we attempt to legislate upon the railroad issue without knowledge of the truth of these charges.

Now, I am not disposed to treat these charges lightly. We have been hearing rumors of these frauds for many years. Suspicion of dishonesty in connection with railroad management exists very generally in the minds of the people. Besides this is the fact that representatives of over 2,000,000 railroad employees, comprising some of the most conservative labor organizations in the world, have made the charges. These labor officials assert that the charges are true. They are demanding an investigation of them. Representing more than 2,000,000 citizens of our country, come these charges and this demand for an investigation. More than one-tenth of the entire population of the United States may be said to be back of these charges. The people back of them are railroad employees, many of whom have an inside knowledge of the facts. Outside of the railroad managers no class of our citizens has so much knowledge of this subject. The charges, therefore, are to be taken with the greatest seriousness. They are worthy of the attention of Congress. We can not afford to do less than give the full investigation which is demanded.

Mr. Speaker, the 4 railway brotherhoods and 10 affiliated railway labor organizations of the American Federation of Labor, who prefer these charges, have for the last 25 years been recognized as the most conservative and responsible labor unions of America. They declare that they are "prepared during the investigation which we invoke to substantiate each and every one of these charges." They charge the fraudulent doubling of the property investment accounts of the railways above their cost of reproduction, new; and that the railway executives are conspiring through banking houses and interlocking directorates and the United States Chamber of Commerce to fasten this fraudulent capitalization upon the public as a legal basis for taxing the transportation of goods. They specify hundreds of millions of stock bonuses representing not one dollar of investment in the public highways on which, nevertheless, the railroads ask the public to pay dividends. They specify millions of acres of lands given by State and Federal Governments to the railroads that go to swell their investment accounts on which returns are demanded; they charge hundreds of millions of excessive earnings above dividend requirements, plowed into the properties and made the basis for rate exactions.

They charge that President Underwood, of the Erie Railroad, states that pay rolls of employees have been enormously padded by the Railroad Administration, and that if this has been done it has been by collusion of railway managers, at the instance of Wall Street, in order to make it appear that Government control is wasteful and extravagant.

They charge that by like collusion immense quantities of railway supplies have been bought beyond present needs and at Government expense under war prices in order that these supplies may be used when the roads go back to private control.

If these charges so responsibly made are true, then there is a barefaced attempt to defraud the American public of billions of dollars at a time when they are staggering under the burden of living costs. It would be a disgrace to Congress if this demand for an orderly and lawful investigation should be denied or smothered in committee. The railway labor organizations declare that the evidence which they will adduce bears directly on legislation involving the possible return of the railroads to the alleged looters and plunderers of the public highways. If, as they say, they have in their hands the evidence of such gigantic plundering and looting, or can point out where it can be obtained, what reasonable objection can be raised to granting an investigation?

Mr. Speaker, we can not properly refuse the lawful requests of labor leaders who seek a constitutional means of allaying the unrest that is rising to the danger point. The moment the millions of men of the labor organizations become convinced that Congress will not heed the reasonable requests of their leaders, we may look out for trouble. The moment the people of the country become convinced that an attempt is being made—mind, I am not charging that such an attempt is being made, but I urge upon this House speedy action—the moment they think they see an attempt to smother or delay investigation into charges of such magnitude and gravity, then forces will be let loose in this Republic that might eventually become ungovernable. The warning of the leaders of the American railway labor movement should not be lightly disregarded. They have been repeatedly uttered, accompanied by these charges. Shall we ignore them now?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I was going to express surprise that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], coming from a great industrial center, as he does, from Birmingham, should state that the people of this country were shocked by these charges. Charges similar to these have been made in this country for the last 5 or 10 years, and there is not anything new about them. I was going to state that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been investigating that question for five years.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing vague rumors of these matters for years. They have been charged in newspapers and elsewhere, but nobody heretofore has come forward and said, "I make that charge; I have the proofs; I demand an investigation; I offer to prove what I say." For the first time in the history of this question in this country have we a responsible body of men coming forward and saying, "We stand ready to prove the truth of these charges."

Meanwhile the representatives of the employees continue to reiterate their far-reaching charges. Only to-day their attorney and spokesman, Mr. Plumb, wrote the chairman of the committee a letter formally repeating the charges and demanding an investigation of them. I extend this letter in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 18, 1919.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: My attention is called to a report in the Washington Post to the effect that you intend to confer with officials of the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to learn whether it will be practicable for that body to conduct the investigation of railroad financiering which I have requested on behalf of the organized railway employees of America.

May I say, with reference to this report and with reference to your questions of like purport put to me when I preferred the charges of the railway brotherhoods and their 10 affiliated railway labor organizations of the American Federation of Labor, that I fear you have missed the intent which actuated the preferment of those charges at this time. The investigation should be made and reported upon before Congress acts.

Congress needs enlightenment. If a political conspiracy exists, as responsibly charged by labor organizations generally acknowledged to be the most conservative in America, to seek validation by Congress of billions of fictitious railroad securities, prompt investigation is needed by a committee of the House or Senate, or preferably by a joint committee of both Houses, of evidence which we are prepared to make available. Congress has now the railroad problem before it. Neither Congress nor the American people can pass intelligently upon this problem without the information which we have and are prepared to submit.

Now, if Congress wishes to designate the Interstate Commerce Commission as the instrument of the investigation demanded, well and good. But it should be expressly provided that the investigation be prompt, in order that the report of the commission upon the catalogue of charges may be placed before Congress and the public before the enactment of any measure looking to the restoration of the railroads to hands which we denounce as unclean.

With all deference to you and to the great committee of the House on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which you are the honored chairman, permit me to reiterate these charges, which have been made with the utmost deliberation and care, with a full sense of their gravity, and sustained by the weighty and conservative forces of American labor unions with the offer at once to substantiate each and every of them:

We charge that the railroads of the United States seek of Congress legalization of a fraudulent property investment account, fraudulent by billions of dollars and built up in violation of the constitutions of the separate States and of the United States. On the basis of these fraudulent billions they seek to fasten, through act of Congress, a charge upon the cost of living of the entire Nation by exacting a return of at least 6 per cent from excessive transportation rates.

We charge that the men who are pushing this conspiracy through the United States Chamber of Commerce and other bodies are controlled in whole or in part by the Morgan interests, the Rockefeller interests, and the Gould interests. Through the interlocking directorates of banks and trust companies these three financial groups control the 254,000 miles of railway of the United States. We will submit complete charts showing these interlocking directorates and financial interests in their relation to the railroads.

We charge that the five railway valuations first completed and published by the Interstate Commerce Commission show the aggregate property investment accounts of the railways named therein to be double their estimated actual cost of reproduction, new. We charge that, so far as the valuation division of the Interstate Commerce Commission has valued railroads, after nearly completing its survey of the entire transportation area of the United States, this ratio of double the estimated actual cost of reconstruction, new, holds constant with respect to the aggregate property investment account as submitted by the railroads. It is upon this fraudulent investment account which the United States Chamber of Commerce and the financial interests behind it ask Congress to compel the American people to pay over 6 per cent in yearly returns.

We charge that wherever the Valuation Division of the Interstate Commerce Commission has found the investment account, as stated by the carrier, equal to its estimated cost of reproduction, new, it is due to surplus and excessive earnings after ample dividends have been declared to stockholders and bondholders, and that these excessive earnings extorted from the public have been ploughed into the property and made the basis for corresponding and unwarranted transportation charges.

We demand investigation of the statement made by President Underwood, of the Erie Railroad—and, since these charges were made, reaffirmed by him—that the railroad employment pay rolls have been padded under Government control in order to build a political machine. We charge that if it is found that the pay rolls have been so padded, the railway managers have padded them to make the expense account under Government control seem extravagant and wasteful.

We charge that when the Government took control it found the railroads systematically starved in the interest of the financial groups named. It found their roadbeds and rolling stock depleted. It spent hundreds of millions of dollars to put them in condition. We charge that managers under the control of these financial groups have diverted vast sums of the Government's money for upkeep and supplies, not only for present needs, but anticipating the long future after the railroads should be returned to their private looters and despoilers. They have piled up these supplies for a long period of operation ahead, paid for out of the people's money at exorbitant war prices.

We charge that the Interstate Commerce Commission was six years ago directed by Congress, in the provisions of the valuation act, to find and report upon the value of all aids, gifts, and grants made to railway corporations, the value of those grants at the time made, and the value of the portions of the grants still in the possession of the carriers at the time of valuation. This work has not been done.

We charge that an area of land larger than the combined areas of the New England States, New York, Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois has been given by the United States and by State governments to the railroads without compensation and in order to help them build the Nation's highways. We charge that of these grants, making allowance for the 115,000,000 acres patented and the 35,000,000 acres forfeited prior to June 30, 1910, the greater part of over 40,000,000 acres remains available. The values of these grants have been sequestered by railway promoters or capitalized as part of the book values of the railway properties on which the railroad corporations directed by the financial groups named herein now ask Congress to permit them to extort fraudulent returns from the public.

We charge that the property investment accounts of the railroads have been fraudulently doubled above their estimated cost of reproduction, new, by such means as these: The $250,000,000 in bonuses given away to their stockholders from 1900 to 1910 by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad; by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; the Chicago & North Western; the Great Northern; the Illinois Central; and the Southern Pacific. On this $250,000,000 of excess capital in 1913 alone the public was compelled to pay more than $11,000,000. The public had to pay in that year $4,317,000 on stock fraudulently issued by eight eastern railroads during 1900 to 1910 for $101,000,000 less than the market value. During the same period 18 representative railroads running through all parts of the country gave away stock bonuses aggregating $450,000,000. On these the public has had to pay—now pays.

We wish gravely and responsibly to point out that these gigantic frauds, of which we have given only instances, now work to overburden the people with charges on their cost of living.

We wish to show that the people have given gifts to the railroads, and that the railroads are taxing them upon those gifts for the sake of their private owners. We wish to show that they have perpetrated fraud after fraud upon the public, looted the vast railroad systems of the Nation, and that they now bring the record of their loot and plunder to Congress, saying: "Make it lawful and let us exact a toll of 6 per cent upon these billions that we have filched. That will restore our credit."

They ask further that the livelihood of over 2,000,000 railway employees and their families shall be placed again at their tender mercies. Lawless and irresponsible, they accuse the responsible leaders of the American labor movement of attempting to foment revolution. Instead, we show that we are law-abiding. We appeal to the people, to Congress, and the courts. We ask that the constitution of the States and of the United States be vindicated. We ask for an immediate and peaceable hearing of our charges, responsibly made.

You will recall the earnest warning uttered to your committee by Mr. Garretson, in which he said that it is largely within the power of Congress to allay the unrest which is taxing to the utmost the energies of the labor leaders to restrain. In this law-abiding course we ask your aid. We ask that our charges be respected and heeded, that this hearing be had, that the investigation prayed for be made, and that a report upon the findings be laid before Congress before it acts to restore the veins and arteries of the Nation to the private financial groups that have drained them of their life-giving properties.

Very sincerely, yours,

GLENN E. PLUMB,
Counsel for the Organized Railway Employees of America.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution asking for an investigation of these charges. It has been referred to the Committee on Rules. The resolution provides for the appointment of an investigating committee. I think that is the way to get at this matter. It will not answer to refer it to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have been dealing with various aspects of this question and have some facts, it is true, but they have not had this identical question put upon them, decision has not been asked of them, and many of its aspects are beyond the scope of the investigation that they could carry on. The commission is loaded down with work; it is not possible for them to make promptly an investigation, as it ought to be made. The work should be carried forward by a committee of the House, as it seems to me. The full facts should be brought out before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reports on the measures proposed by the railroads, which would validate their securities and make good the capitalization and debts of these great corporations. We ought to know the true facts before it is put out of the power of the people to ever get relief from such a situation. This is not an issue in which merely the railroad companies and the employees are concerned; it concerns the whole people of the United States. They should not be required during all the years of the future to pay tribute to the railroads upon a fictitious capitalization.

Mr. EMERSON. This being the only resolution before the House to take up this matter, does not the gentleman think we should pass this and include in it food and clothing, as well as shoes?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman refers to the particular resolution before the House now, I think it should be adopted. But I say to the gentleman that we ought also to go into the question of transportation and the capitalization of the railroads, which will form the basis of freight and passenger charges in future. That question will remain with us long after we get through with the present acute stage of the cost of living.

Mr. EMERSON. I suggest to the gentleman that could be done in conjunction with the legislation as to the high cost of living.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not at all. To tack on the railroad investigation to the investigation of shoe prices will simply load the latter down, delay action which should be immediate, and perhaps in the end defeat the very purpose we are trying to accomplish.

For information of the House I attach my resolution calling for an investigation of the charges made by the representatives of the railroad employees, House resolution 243:

House resolution 243.

Whereas sensational charges have been made before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by the responsible representatives of 2,200,000 railroad employees, that the railroads of the United States are now seeking to validate billions of fraudulent capitalization, thereby burdening the American people in their cost of living with unjust and oppressive charges for transportation; and

Whereas if this gigantic fraud has been perpetrated the American people are entitled to know it and the full extent thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed and empowered to appoint a committee of six Representatives in Congress, which committee shall be charged with the duty to investigate and ascertain and report upon the truth of said charges, to wit:

1. Whether it is true, as charged, that the railroads have fraudulently issued vast sums in securities in excess of the consideration paid therefor, and, if so, the extent of such usurpation.

2. Whether it is true, as charged, that such railroads have expended on their properties out of excess earnings large amounts received by them as payment for such service, and, if so, to what extent and amount, and how far such expenditures are now represented in their investment accounts.

3. Whether it is true, as charged, that gifts, grants, aids, and donations of great value made to said corporations in aid of the construction of their railways have been appropriated to the private benefit of promoters or capitalized against the public in property investment accounts, and, if so, to what extent.

4. Whether it is true, as charged, that the pay rolls of the railroads while under Government control have been padded for political purposes, and, if so, on whose responsibility such expenditures have been made and the extent thereof.

5. Whether it is true, as charged, that while under Government control the managers of the railroads have spent large and unnecessary sums for the maintenance and renewals of their properties, and for overcoming past depreciation, and, if so, to what extent, and on whom rests the responsibility therefor.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of said inquiry the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths and affirmations, take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and may hold its sessions at such places as the committee may determine. Said committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the result of its inquiries, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable. The Speaker is hereby empowered to issue subpœnas upon the request of the chairman of said committee at any time, and during any recess of the House throughout the inquiry of the committee, and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other process transmitted to him by said committee. Said committee is hereby authorized to employ such attorneys, counsel, auditors, statisticians, investigators, clerks, and other agents as it may deem fit for the purposes of such investigation.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I will occupy but very little time, and I wish to say to the House that for Congress to investigate the high cost of living and to reduce the high cost of living quickly is a very difficult problem, one not so easy as it may appear to be on the surface. In the first place, prices are always high when there is a shortage of supply. When the demand is greater than the supply you may look for high prices.

I am old enough to remember the Civil War. And after that war the prices were very high for some years. I can remember that flour sold at $30 a barrel in the United States and sugar at 50 cents a pound. It is not quite that high now. Meat is selling at a very high price.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the circulating medium in this country at that time was only about 40 or 50 or 60 cents on the dollar, was it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is right—paper money, greenbacks, worth about 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And every dollar in the United States is a dollar now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri that there is not a dollar in the United States that is worth a hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When?

Mr. MADDEN. Now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it worth?

Mr. MADDEN. About 48 cents. That is the purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is no such case as it was after the Civil War.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit me, of course we have already expanded the currency about $13,000,000,000 by making loans to people who had to buy Government bonds and who had not any money otherwise with which to buy them.

The banks and the Government encouraged these people to buy. More than 90 per cent of the 30,000,000 people who bought bonds did not have a dollar with which to pay. The banks had to loan to them. The banks did not have the money to loan them. They had to take these bonds and put them up as collateral security with their own notes and get them rediscounted by the Federal reserve banks. The Federal reserve banks did not have any money to loan, and they had to issue Federal reserve note currency—$13,000,000,000 of expansion.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not mean to say that there has been issued $13,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes?

Mr. MADDEN. I mean there has been that expansion by loans.

Mr. WINGO. You mean of credits?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; of credits. It has reduced the purchasing power of the dollar to-day to 48 cents, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to use up the time of the gentleman from Michigan, but——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can get all the time he wants.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is clearly off his box.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The proposition that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was talking about was paper money.

Mr. MADDEN. This is paper money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. After the Civil War a dollar of paper money was worth somewhere from 40 cents to 60 cents. Now a paper dollar is worth just as much as the gold dollar.

Mr. MADDEN. We had no gold or silver in circulation at that time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gold dollar is not the standard now, what is it?

Mr. MADDEN. The gold dollar is the standard, but it is not circulating. It is the Federal reserve notes that are in circulation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Federal reserve note is just as good as the dollar. If you think it is not, go down and try it. The truth about the whole thing is that the whole world is on a paper basis.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the whole world is on a paper basis, and the gentleman is mistaken when he says that we are on a better basis than any other country in the world.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never said a word to that effect.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentlemen will permit me, I will say that there is a shortage of supply in this country at the present time. I have a statement here issued by the Department of Commerce a few days ago, to which I wish to call the attention of gentlemen, as to the exports of food supply. In the first place let me say that for four and one-half years the whole world has been engaged in destroying human life and property, and not producing food articles or anything else of use, producing nothing but distress and misery, and there is a shortage of supply all over the world, and a great demand for these articles right now. But in the last 12 months ending with June we exported, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000 worth of breadstuffs and nearly $1,250,000,000 worth of meat. Had we been able to keep that supply at home, our people would now have plenty to supply all demands at home. But there is a shortage at home and abroad, which adds very much to the cost of living all over the world.

But to talk about Congress right now quickly reducing the cost of living without reducing the cost of production is demagogy. It does not mean anything else. [Applause.] It can not be done. How can we increase the cost of production and at the same time lower the cost of the things produced by that man's labor? It is silly to talk about it. Gentlemen, the cost of production the world over is inflated—on the crest of the wave at the present time. Everything that enters into the cost of production is high, and labor is at least 90 per cent of the cost of the production of anything that we produce, either upon the farm or in the factory. If we increase men's pay can we at the same time lower the cost of living? No sensible, sane business man will make that statement and mean what he says.

I notice that this resolution strikes out sugar. Let me say to the gentlemen of the House that the Food Administration at about the beginning of this year, in January, entered into an agreement with Cuban sugar producers to the effect that our Government would purchase all the sugar produced for export by Cuba. I have a copy of that contract. An upset price was set forth in that contract at which our Government would take that sugar f. o. b. Habana or f. o. b. New York, duty paid. In addition to that the Food Administration entered into a contract with the sugar refiners of this country to the effect that the refiners would take that sugar from the Government of the United States, through the Food Administration, at a certain price, and the Food Administration, under powers vested in them, fixed the wholesale price not only of that sugar but sugar produced in this country from beets and cane at $8.65 per 100 pounds.

That is the law now in force and enforceable by the Food Administration. The price has been fixed at $10 per ton for sugar beets to the beet-sugar manufacturers of this country, and they are paying that price for the farmer's crop to-day for all the beets produced in this country, and to the manufacturers the price of sugar was fixed by the Food Administration at $8.65 per 100 pounds.

The thing to investigate is what are the retailers selling that sugar for, and what are their profits, and whether it is an unreasonable profit. The manufacturer is completely bound by these contracts and under the supervision of the Food Administration, and therefore it was wise to strike sugar from this resolution, because nothing can be done or should be done there, because the Government now controls the manufacturer's price absolutely.

If you will take into consideration these questions, the cost of production and the amount of those articles that we are exporting to other parts of the world, you will find that no great bugaboo is going to be found in this investigation, though some men may think there will be.

It is true, undoubtedly, that profiteers have gone beyond that which is reasonable and are exacting from the people more profits than they should, but in every instance it will be found that the cost of production is high. I have just returned from my home State, Michigan, and while there I made inquiry and found that farm labor is receiving board and washing and $60 a month. Do you believe that the farmer can produce food cheaply and sell it at a low price when it is costing him a high price to produce it? No; if there is profiteering, it is in the cold storages and in the high prices exacted by the wholesalers, middlemen, and retailers, in my opinion. I do not believe the farmers to-day are getting any more than a fair price for their farm products. Investigation might show it; but let us go at this matter sanely. Let men be sensible. Let them be reasonable. Let them investigate and find where the trouble is and there remedy the trouble. I was talking to a barber the other day. He said that we ought to lower the cost of living. When I asked him if he thought it could be done without lowering the cost of production, he said it could. I said, "My friend, you now are working how many hours a day?" He said, "Ten hours." "You are shaving men at 20 cents and cutting hair for 40 cents?" He replied, "Yes." I asked him, "Can you reduce your working hours to six hours a day and reduce the price you get for shaving to 10 or 15 cents and increase your income? If so, tell me how you are going to do it." He said he did not think it was a fair illustration. I said, "Sir, you know more about your own business than you know about anybody else's business. How can you shorten your hours of labor and lower the price of your product and increase your income at the same time?" Oh, gentlemen, it is silly to talk about lowering the cost of living without first lowering the cost of production.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. The high cost of living is merely the result of several contributing causes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Many contributing causes.

Mr. REAVIS. And the only way to reduce it is to reduce the cause.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. REAVIS. One contributing cause is the cost of production.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. We understand from the press that the President is considering the raising of the wages of railroad labor to reduce the high cost of living. Do you know how you can decrease the result by increasing the cause which produces that result?

Mr. FORDNEY. I said a few moments ago that any man who advocated such a thing was a demagogue, and I have nothing to take back on that subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The United Fruit Co., which has headquarters in Boston, New York, and other big cities, according to its own statement is making 40 per cent; that is, $40 on every $100 of capital invested. Its profits have been so huge in the last few years that it has paid off millions of dollars of bonded indebtedness which would not ordinarily expire for years. In fact, the other day that company called in bonds because its profits were so huge. That company is now charging from $5.75 to $6.50 for bananas that before the war were sold for from $1.75 to $3 per hundred. It was a common thing in the big cities of the country to find bananas, which are a food as well as a fruit, selling for from 15 to 20 cents a dozen, and now they are 40 to 50 cents a dozen. This company practically controls this particular trade, and I want to ask the gentleman, in all fairness, if he does not think that 40 per cent profit in these times is an unconscionable profit?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that under existing law the administration has power under war legislation to regulate those things.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope that is so.

Mr. FORDNEY. We passed these laws and they remain upon our statute books until we receive notice from the President that peace has been declared between our Government and the Government of Germany. No such notice has been given by our President. Therefore this power rests in the administration.

What is the Department of Justice doing to correct the very thing that the gentleman is complaining about? The power rests there. It is not necessary for Congress to go any further than it has gone in the way of giving the Government greater power, because we have given them all the power they need, all that we can give them. Why are they not correcting these injustices now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to bring out the point that the gentleman was developing here, that there are some big interests in the country to-day—and I name the United Fruit Co. as one—that are getting unconscionable profits from the people. If the Department of Justice has the power and has not exercised it, then the responsibility rests with that department; it does not make any difference what administration it is.

Mr. FORDNEY. If they have not the power under existing laws, which are war measures, they should come to Congress and ask for that power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree to that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Because under such circumstances, if that corporation or any other great corporation or set of individuals in the country is exacting too much profit from the people, that condition ought to be corrected, and the power rests in the administration, or it can be given by the Congress of the United States, if asked for.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. I understand the resolution has been read and is now being read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. Amendments are in order.

Mr. DENISON. When do we vote upon these various amendments that have been offered?

The SPEAKER. At any time when debate is finished.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. In just a moment. How much time is there? Is the time unlimited?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Under what rule are we proceeding? Who has charge of the time, and how much time is there?

The SPEAKER. There is no limit to the time. We are proceeding under the general rules of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And every man who gets recognition is entitled to an hour?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has already spoken once. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, when the Speaker was out of the chair a moment ago, temporarily, I asked the then occupant of the chair for recognition when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] had finished. The then occupant of the chair said that he would recognize me. Of course, if the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] wants to speak, I shall gladly give way to him, but I would like to be recognized after that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming prefer to speak now or after the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MONDELL. That depends upon how long the gentleman from New York intends to occupy the floor.

Mr. CALDWELL. For only a few moments.

Mr. MONDELL. I merely want to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to carry out the agreement made by the former occupant of the chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, I do not want to unduly limit debate, but I think we ought to get through some time with this discussion.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will not take more than 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to have 10 minutes. I do not think I will take more than five.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield the gentleman five minutes, and if he needs more I shall yield more.

[Mr. CALDWELL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced at a time when it was thought the House was going to take a recess, and so it was framed that it would have the Federal Trade Commission make a report on one commodity by the time we returned from the proposed recess. Other items were included, and the resolution was framed as to them so that the report might be made at a subsequent time. After the resolution was referred to the committee, in consultation with some members of the committee, it was thought that in order to get quick action it would be better to confine it to one commodity, and that one was shoes, the first one mentioned in the resolution. That suggestion was acceptable to me, although I would like to have an investigation of all of these matters. But the prime purpose of the resolution is to secure promptly for Congress the facts in the case, and if it is to be of any benefit at all, either to Congress or the country, those facts must be ascertained promptly, so that if legislation is needed we can legislate; and if legislation can not reach the evils, then, at least, let the country know that Congress is helpless or that nothing can be done in the way of legislation to correct the situation.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. If a preference is to be given to any commodity that is to be investigated right now does not the gentleman think food should be given that preference?

Mr. IGOE. My personal preference would be food. But let me say to the gentleman by taking the whole subject of food it would take a long time to reach that. What item of food would you have them undertake to investigate?

Mr. EMERSON. The same principle that increases the cost of potatoes, apples, meats, cheese, and eggs increases the cost of other articles. Is not that true? Is it not a matter of principle? All foods are up, and the same reason that would make meat high would make cheese and eggs high.

Mr. IGOE. Not necessarily. If there are business practices that can be reached by law we can reach them through this particular item. Now, let me say to the gentleman and the House that when the Federal Trade Commission subsequently made this report on shoes I went to the Trade Commission, after it was impossible to get this resolution immediately considered by the House, and discussed the report made. I have not seen the full report but the summary indicates that it has not been brought down fully to cover the last two years, the period I think it is essential to cover not only on shoes but these other commodities, and I was told that the commission has been ordered to investigate a number of things by the Senate, including agricultural implements and a half dozen other things, and that with the money now appropriated by Congress it would take possibly two years, with the small force that they have, to complete those investigations; that this investigation, bringing it down to date, would take probably five or six months, unless an additional appropriation was made by Congress, which would enable them to go at it quickly. Now, the Federal Trade Commission has asked for additional funds, and I suppose the Congress will be reasonable with them and give them a reasonable additional appropriation. But if this House ordered this investigation, with the facts already in hand regarding the manufacture of shoes, regarding the labor cost, and with a force which can be quickly put to work upon it, I see no reason why this report can not be back within five or six weeks, and then the country will know the facts, not as they existed a year and a half or two years ago, but they will know the facts as of to-day. And if Congress can legislate, if there are new laws that can be passed, then let us get to work, and I believe that the great benefit will be not only in regard to the price of shoes, but in regard to everything else, as the publicity that is given to the facts will in a way correct the other evils that now exist.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman from Missouri think that the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Lever Act are sufficient to handle the situation that everyone is complaining about?

Mr. IGOE. I do not; and I will tell you why——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. IGOE. I am not a political economist, and I am not prepared to give to the House all the reasons for high prices. I have heard about the inflation of the currency, and it is true that has something to do with it as far as I am able to figure. There is also a world's shortage of production; that is true. There is profiteering; that is true. But under the Sherman law you must prove combinations; you must prove restraints of trade, and where you have a shortage of production and a great demand they do not have to enter into combinations. They can exact almost any price until they reach that price where the man who needs an article has not the means whereby to purchase it. I have a resolution pending, I will say to the gentleman, which seeks to have this House, through the Ways and Means Committee, find out if it is true, as I believe it is, that the taxes that we have levied are being passed on. I have heard of instances, for example, where landlords have had to pay $10,000 additional taxes under our war-tax laws and which they paid on last year's income; but this year they passed them on to the man who pays the rent. I would like to see the revenue act amended so as to catch these people who pass these heavy taxes on down the line. The salaried man and wage earner can not pass on their taxes, and I am afraid the other people are passing their tax burdens on to the wage earners and salaried people by raising prices.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Where millions of dozens of eggs are held in cold storage and large quantities of meats and other foods and leather are piled up in warehouses to the value of millions of dollars, is that not in restraint of trade?

Mr. IGOE. No. You can——

Mr. KNUTSON. Under what authority are they proceeding against the so-called hoarders?

Mr. IGOE. Under the Lever Act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why did not they proceed a year ago?

Mr. IGOE. I presume then they were then regulating it by the system of licenses. But the cry went up all over after the armistice was signed, and especially, I think, from the gentlemen on the Republican side, that the Government ought to let business alone, should let it be free. Now they are free and are going ahead and raising the prices all over.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. IGOE. I hope they will confine this resolution to one thing that we can get a report quickly on, and if the facts justify legislation let us legislate. At least, let the country know what the facts are. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the appropriation for the work of the Federal Trade Commission is a lump sum in addition to that appropriated for the salaries of the commissioners, and amounts to $1,000,000 for the year. Only about $100,000 of that has been expended for the month of July. The Federal Trade Commission has already commenced work to investigate with regard to the matters of the high cost of living, and that investigation is confined not only to shoes but also embraces the other necessaries of life. But I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this resolution is not worth the paper it is written on. It provides:

> That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into the increase in the price of shoes, to ascertain the cause and necessity for the increase; to ascertain the manufacturers' cost price and selling price and the retailers' cost price and selling price for the years 1918 and 1919, and report to the House at the earliest convenient date the result of the investigation.

It will be noted that this resolution is a House resolution. When passed it is not an act of Congress. Now, what does the Federal Trade Commission law provide for in regard to investigations required by either House? Section 6 provides that the commission shall have power to investigate; that on the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report facts relating to any alleged violation of the antitrust act of any corporation the act gives the commission power to investigate on its own motion. Those powers are broad.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. IGOE. If the commission may of its own motion make an investigation, it can make this?

Mr. GOOD. It can of its own motion, and it is doing it of its own motion. It is making an investigation on its own motion broader than here proposed and including the requirements of the resolution.

Mr. IGOE. If it may do it of its own motion, can it not do it when the House requests it?

Mr. GOOD. When the House requests information, it can only furnish information if the information desired is of the facts concerning an alleged violation of antitrust laws by any corporation.

Mr. IGOE. I think the gentleman does not mean to say——

Mr. GOOD. That is the law, and the commission has no authority to expend a single dollar to make any investigation under that law which is requested by the President or by either branch of Congress unless the resolution comes within the express provision of that act.

Now, the President has additional power. During the war we gave the President very unusual power; and not under this Federal Trade Commission act, but under the act that gave the President those unusual war powers he has requested the Federal Trade Commission to make the investigation as to the high cost of living.

But I say to the gentleman from Missouri that if he will read the law that is upon the statute books he will find that neither House of Congress can expect the Federal Trade Commission to respond to a resolution, and, what is more the fact, ought not to have the power without the consent of the other House to permit or to require the expenditure of maybe millions of dollars simply by passing a resolution through one branch of Congress. Broad investigation should be made only when Congress requests it. The only power that Congress gave the Federal Trade Commission to investigate under such resolutions of either House was the alleged violation of the antitrust law by any corporation. It did not even give the Federal Trade Commission the power to investigate, on the request of one House alone, where an individual or a copartnership was violating the antitrust law; and even if that kind of an investigation were ordered, if a resolution requiring it is passed by the House or the Senate, it would not confer upon the Federal Trade Commission the power to make an investigation unless the commission does have the power to make such investigation on its own initiative and is exercising it.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Just for a question.

Mr. IGOE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that while the commission itself may spend millions of dollars in doing a thing, the House can not authorize it to do the same thing?

Mr. GOOD. They have to get an appropriation, which requires the joint action of both Houses. I have read the law. The gentleman is a good lawyer, and——

Mr. IGOE. I have read the law, too——

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is a good lawyer, and if he will read that provision he will come to the same conclusion that I have arrived at and that anyone else will arrive at, that when the law provides what investigation the commission can make upon the request of the President or either branch of Congress it can not go beyond that.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Is not the Federal Trade Commission making an investigation in response to a Senate resolution alone?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; they are making some investigation, and they are having a good deal of trouble with regard to that provision of the law, and they may have trouble later on if they violate the law in this regard.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. There is no use, it seems to me, for the legislative branch of the Government to attempt to do very much at this time in the way of reducing the high cost of living. I did not realize that there was any possible power we could give the President that we had not given by legislation. Gentlemen have stated several very good reasons why living is high. Another reason will be found in our exports. We are exporting as we never exported before. Take boots and shoes. For the month of June, 1914, we exported only a little over $1,000,000 worth, and for the month of June of this present year we exported $8,000,000 worth. Take leather and skins. In June, 1914, we exported $3,400,000 worth, but in the last month of June we exported almost $32,000,000 worth. Take breadstuffs. In the month of June, 1914, we exported $14,000,000 worth of breadstuffs, and in June, 1919, we exported $118,000,000 worth of breadstuffs. Take meat and dairy products. For the year 1914 we exported $146,000,000 worth in round numbers, and in the year ended June 30, 1919, we exported $1,167,000,000 worth.

And what is more, out of the Treasury of the United States we are furnishing the money to buy our own products to send to Europe. And when you have the United States bidding against itself for all the necessaries of life you are going to have high prices, irrespective of the laws that we might pass. We furnish the produce and the money to buy it with. Many of these countries are bankrupt and will never repay, so why should they worry so long as we stint ourselves to furnish both produce and the money with which to buy it. Europe does not care what it costs, so long as we furnish both produce and the money that pays for it. If we are honestly working to reduce the high cost of living, if we want to bring down the cost of shoes to the wearers of shoes in America, all that it is necessary to do is for the Secretary of the Treasury to stop loaning money and for the President to put an embargo upon shoes and leather temporarily. If you want to put down the price of meat and meat products for America, all the President has to do is to put an embargo upon meats and meat products for a short time, and you will see the stores of these products go upon the market at such a rate that the price of these things will be forced down here.

But as long as we are engaged upon this plan of feeding the world and clothing the world and furnishing all the money to the outside world with which to buy the necessaries, high prices will continue. I realize that we are living in an altruistic age. We are to police the world; we are to perform the mandatories because we are best able; we are to feed the world because we are peaceable and industrious; we are to furnish the money because our people will lend their credit; so now we are just getting a little taste of the cost of internationalism. It may be only a forerunner of what will follow. We have advanced almost a billion dollars since the 1st of March to these countries to buy this product, and they do not care what price is paid for it as long as we furnish the materials and furnish the money with which to buy it. How can you prevent high prices under such conditions? I doubt if investigation will reduce them.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman be in favor of putting an embargo upon meats and shoes at this time?

Mr. GOOD. I would, temporarily.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman be in favor of putting an embargo on the exportation of corn and wheat and cotton?

Mr. GOOD. I would, temporarily, and upon cotton and cotton goods if necessary to reduce the price.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman's position, then, is that we do not need any additional legislation, such as was suggested by the President?

Mr. GOOD. There may be something in the President's suggestion with regard to a penalty, with regard to one of the provisions of the food-control act. I have not investigated that.

Mr. GARNER. That is the only suggestion that the President made that meets the gentleman's approval?

Mr. GOOD. That is about the only suggestion that the President made that will get anywhere, and that will not get very far, because no other provision of the law has been enforced, and the other provisions carry penalties, and I think it is now admitted that the President was in error in his discussion as to penalties. That law has been on the statute books for 24 months, and only on Saturday last did the Attorney General, under flaming headlines, announce that the first violator of that law had been fined. No; I want to see penalties placed on that provision of the law if they are not there. I want to give the Attorney General all the power needed to put the violators of the law into the penitentiary, where they belong. [Applause.] But I want the Attorney General to enforce the law and to enforce the penalties which are now in the law, and which he admits are in the law, and which have not been enforced. [Applause.] That will do something. But if you want to reduce living costs let the President act. He has the power. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the entire question of the high cost of living, in my opinion, can be divided into two concrete propositions. We must approach the discussion of it, it strikes me, from the standpoint, first, that we have to-day in America more money than any people ever had in all the annals of time. The whole world has for the last four or five years been engaged in the destruction of property, but in this entire conflict there has not been one dollar destroyed. Property has been destroyed, lives have been lost, but the dollar has not been destroyed. Whenever money is plentiful commodities go up, and whenever money is scarce commodities go down. That has always been so and always will be so. I think the most striking piece of philosophy that I have heard on this question came to me not long since from the lips of my yardman. When I was leaving I told him good-by and gave him a dollar, and I said to him jokingly, "Now, Garrett, don't spend that in riotous living." He said, "Boss, there ain't nothin' cheap now but a dollar." And he was right. There is nothing in the world to-day that is cheap except the dollar. We here in America are trying, with the products of field and farm and factory, to feed a world that is starving and to clothe the nations that are naked. There is no doubt in the world, gentlemen, that the only people on earth who have enough to eat and enough to wear to-day are on this side of the Atlantic. People talk about a return to normal times. They forget that the entire human race has had high fever for between four and five years, suffering from the fever of war. Now war has ceased to be, and it is just as unreasonable to expect conditions to become normal at once as it would be unreasonable to expect a man who has had typhoid fever for seven weeks to get up and go to work the minute the doctor says that he no longer has fever. The patient has to go through the convalescent period, and the world must also go through a convalescent period. Prices are high for one reason because money is plentiful. The gentleman who has just preceded me on this floor [Mr. GOOD] made some remarks about an embargo. I agree with him fully that, perchance, a prohibition against our trading with the world might result in some decline of prices here in America; but at what a cost!

The cost staggers the human imagination, and I do not believe that any man, either in this Chamber or out of it, would advocate the remedy proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. [Applause.] I can not conceive it. The effect of it would be too horrible. Therefore my first contention is that the high price of commodities to-day is directly traceable in large part to the tremendous volume of money that we have in America. But then there is another side of the question. When you want to find out why the individual consumer is paying a price you want to investigate whether that price is a fair price in relation to what the producer gets. I think to-day it is manifest that a mere statement of the prices themselves carries with it the irresistible conclusion that the consumer in practically every instance is paying more than he should pay, considering what the producer gets. Take sugar for instance. Down in my State we raise a great deal of sugar. Now, the price that a man gets for his sugar is fixed by law. It is well that that fact should be known, so that you gentlemen, when you go to the grocery store, when the housewife from Maine to California and from Minnesota to Florida buys sugar, she may know whether the price quoted to her is fair. We in Louisiana get $8.82 per hundred pounds for granulated table sugar. That is what the manufacturer gets for it. Therefore it is an easy matter to add the freight rate to that cost and to add a legitimate percentage to that cost, and then for the individuals to determine whether or not he is paying more than he should pay for his sugar.

Take the question of cotton. We raise a great deal of cotton in my country——

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. EMERSON. When I was home my grocer would sell me only 5 pounds of sugar at a time, and at another time only 2 pounds.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. He said they were sending it abroad and getting more money for it. I think we should keep enough sugar at home to supply our own needs.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. There is no reason to-day why any grocer in this city or in any other city should not sell you 10 pounds of sugar just as quickly as he will sell you 1 pound, unless the local market is dominated and controlled by the American Sugar Trust. There is no reason in the world except that.

Mr. EMERSON. I will say that in my town you can not get sugar except in very small amounts.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. The beet-sugar people of the West are getting 8 cents and a fraction for their sugar and we in the South are getting 8 cents and a fraction for our sugar. The Cuban crop was bought by the Food Administration under an agreed price; and I state here without fear of successful contradiction that if it had not been so bought and if the price had not been so fixed sugar would have been retailing in America for from 15 to 20 cents a pound for the last 12 months.

Mr. GOOD. Then the gentleman would advocate an embargo on sugar, would he not?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I would not.

Mr. GOOD. You would permit them to keep on sending it abroad and holding up the American consumer?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I would not. I state that there is plenty of American sugar right here in America now.

Mr. TEMPLE. How are we going to get it?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. It is here in this country. Every bit of the Cuban sugar crop was bought by us in conjunction with the royal commission of England, and that sugar was divided on a basis which gave to every man in America a sufficient supply of sugar. Remember, we are the greatest consumers of sugar on earth. The reason that sugar is scarce to-day is not because there is an actual scarcity, but because of an artificial scarcity made by the manipulation of the American Sugar Trust.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield me some more time?

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to yield, but the time is all promised.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I do not speak very often. I am on the committee that considered this bill, and I should like to say something more about it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has had 10 minutes already.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes, that time not to be taken out of the hour of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I stated the question of sugar, and if any gentleman will investigate he will find that I am right. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, is it not true that further exportation was forbidden three or four weeks ago, except for sugar already under contract?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I so understand it. There is no question about that. The sugar crop of the West, the sugar crop of Louisiana and of the islands comes in this fall, and while sugar will not be plentiful, there will be enough to go around.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I want to discuss one other question, and if I can get more time I will yield very gladly. Let us take the question of cotton. I have heard a lot of discussion in regard to the price that the man who raises the cotton is getting for his cotton. As a matter of fact the manufacturer of cotton goods, based on his prices of last Saturday, could well afford to pay a basic price of 50 cents per pound and still make better than a fair profit upon the goods that the American people are clothing themselves with. You must find out what the producer is getting for the product before you condemn the producer. To-day every buyer and every merchant who goes to the great cities to lay in his supply of goods will tell you that it is not a question of the jobber trying to sell the goods to them, but it is a question of whether or not they can get the jobber to accept their orders. The world has gone mad with buying. The world is buying everything that is offered at any price, and the manufacturer of goods and the jobber and the wholesaler has taken advantage of the situation and are wringing from the people a tremendous profit. Take the question of leather. There is no relation whatsoever between the cost of the hide and the cost of the shoe. The man who makes the shoe is able to get any price he asks, and therefore he asks a price, and the price of shoes is going up and up and up, and as long as the people will pay these prices the manufacturer of shoes will exact them. Therefore, in the final analysis it comes down to this question, that the producer on the farm, the man who raises the farm products, must not be confused with the profiteer. I am in favor of this resolution. I am in favor of an investigation, because I believe that when the American people see the enormous difference between what the producer is getting for his product and what the consumer has to pay for the same product, that publicity itself, if nothing else, will do good. I say further than that, that this resolution ought to pass. If the Federal Trade Commission refuses to take knowledge of the fact that we have asked them for this investigation it will be easy for us to pass another resolution ordering them to do so, but I do not believe that the Federal Trade Commission will treat the House of Representatives with contempt and refuse to investigate and report.

I am sorry that I have not more time, in order that I might show how the unscrupulous are taking advantage of the situation to their benefit and to the hurt of the great mass of the people.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment? I would like to have the opportunity of making a preferential amendment.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to ask the consent of the gentleman from Wyoming to offer a preferential amendment to improve the text of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that privately with the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the high cost of living. I have some very decided views as to what factors enter into it, including profiteering.

I rose to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the effect that the Federal reserve note had back of it only commercial paper. I think the gentleman is as much in error in that statement as he was in his first statement that $13,000,000,000 of paper money had been issued during the war, which statement he subsequently corrected when his statement was challenged by me. He said he meant bank credits as well as paper money. There is something else besides commercial paper back of the Federal reserve note. I shall not correct the gentleman's statement out of any desire to engage in controversy, but because it is a fact that in some parts of the country the bankers are having trouble to get the people to take Federal reserve notes across the counter. That is because similar erroneous statements have been repeatedly made, and when it comes from a gentleman of the standing of the gentleman from Illinois it is calculated to do harm. I make the assertion, and challenge contradiction, that there is not a piece of paper money in existence in the world to-day that is better than the Federal reserve note. It has something else back of it besides commercial paper. It has the Government, the banks, and ample gold back of it. The Federal reserve note is not on a par with the greenback that depreciated after the Civil War, to which the gentleman refers.

Let us see what is back of the Federal reserve note. First of all, there are back of it the assets of the Federal reserve bank. There is back of it 100 per cent of short-time commercial paper, and there is back of it in each individual instance a minimum of 40 per cent of gold reserve, and, finally, there is back of it the pledge to redeem it in gold by the United States Treasury. The statement that we are on a paper basis is not correct. The Nation is not on a paper basis. This Nation and Spain are the two large nations of the earth that are on a gold basis at this time and have the gold with which to maintain their paper currency.

Let us take the Federal reserve note, for example. I have not seen a statement of the banks since July 1, and what I say is based on conditions July 1, 1919. There is a little over $2,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes outstanding, and I want to say to the House that the Federal reserve banks have in their vaults at this hour gold available for the redemption of all these notes. If you take the statements of the banks on July 1, they have 49 per cent, I think it is, reserve against their note obligation and their deposit obligation combined. In other words, the Federal reserve banks have a reserve of gold in their vaults, back of all their obligations, deposits, and everything else, amounting to 49 per cent.

Therefore the uneasiness of some people about Federal reserve notes, caused by erroneous statements like that of the gentleman from Illinois, is not justified. I would as soon have it as any piece of money on the face of the earth, and this Nation is the only great Nation on the face of the earth that is in position at this hour to redeem its pledges and redeem every piece of its paper currency if presented to-day, and redeem it in gold.

Now, I want to say there has been an inflation of credit, but there is no inflation of Federal reserve issue, and I want to direct the attention of the House to this fact, and it is a significant fact, that every Federal reserve note to-day, theoretically, will be automatically retired within less than 15 days, because the commercial paper deposited with the Federal reserve bank as a basis for their issue has an average maturity of less than 15 days, so there can be no danger from that source. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. If those notes are canceled at the end of 15 days, if they are canceled at the end of that time, there would have to be further rediscounts for the national banks, which would cause a reissue of the notes.

Mr. WINGO. But back of the new issues will be gilt-edge commercial paper, maturing, on an average, in less than 15 days, and in addition there will be at least a 40 per cent reserve of gold. As a matter of fact, there will be practically a 100 per cent of gold back of them. And each new rediscount will represent a bona fide, not a speculative, transaction, so there will be no inflation. As a matter of fact, the Federal Reserve Board in the first six months this year reduced the volume of notes at least $300,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentleman, I do not like the rôle of appearing here as a prophet, but those of you who were in this Chamber last year may have recalled that in the discussion on the proposal to fix the price of wheat I gave a very homely illustration which showed what would happen and what has happened. I referred to an incident on the Plaza of the Capitol, where a vast concourse of people were assembled on the 4th of July to witness the war procession. When the head of the procession reached the crowd, who were all comfortably seated—if everyone had been content and mannerly they could have seen the spectacle without difficulty—a few people started to rise. Then they were followed by others who rose until the entire assemblage was on its feet, leaving their chairs to stand on the ground. In a few moments they found the last state was no better than the first, and a few proceeded to jump on the chairs. In a short while nearly everybody in that vast assemblage were standing on chairs. Now, that is what you have here precisely as the result of your first false start on the path of trying to fix the price of anything contrary to the laws of nature and nature's God. You can not do it. You made a mistake then by attempting to interfere with economic laws by saying that there shall be a minimum price, which was then far in excess of what it should have been, and the ramifications of commerce and of industry are such that everyone was bound to feel that increase. The Steel Trust were also recognized as having the right to war profits—to get more for their rails and for their steel than they were entitled to before, and so it passed along from one industry to the other. All the implements that entered into the processes of production were raised in price, and so on all along the line. There is where the mistake was made, and now we have to devolve that only which we ourselves started on its course—evolution.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have only a minute or so left.

Mr. BAER. The gentleman bases his argument on wheat. I want to state that the price was $3.07 and it reduced it to $2.20, so there has been a reduction of about 30 per cent in the price instead of a rise.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is very true, but it does not answer my contention that we should not meddle with the economic price of wheat or any other product. If wheat went to $3.07 a bushel, I would have let it go, and not put the sanction or the seal of the Government upon it. It was obviously a fraud; it was obviously profiteering. We should have driven at this at the start, and we should have driven also at the Steel Trust when they began their operations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, after this very interesting discussion of some 40 minutes, which has taken a wide, wide range and has been instructive and helpful, I hope the House will bear with me for a few minutes to discuss the matter now before us. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] went to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, one of the strong, capable committees of the House, and after careful consideration that committee considered that the inquiry proposed and the information sought should be confined to one class of products, a class of products which has advanced in price very greatly and in the future prices of which we are all tremendously interested as the leaves begin to fall and we begin to think about our fall and winter footwear. The committee had excellent reasons for suggesting that this inquiry and the information sought be confined to shoes rather than be extended to other articles. The gentleman from Missouri acquiesced in the judgment of the committee in that behalf. He, like the balance of us, is anxious to get information as soon as possible on that important subject. Now, the gentleman from Iowa has very properly said that it is very questionable whether the Federal Trade Commission would be justified in making expenditures to make further investigations of this sort under a simple House resolution. He is entirely right about that. But so long as the House resolution is confined to shoes, and the Federal Trade Commission has been investigating shoes, I think we may assume that they have information on this subject already gathered that they can give us, and whether they make further investigation or not—which I believe they would be justified in doing on their own motion—I think we may very properly request of them the information they now have and such as they can quickly obtain. The country is tremendously interested just at this time in every phase of the high cost of living, and it is the duty of the Congress, the duty of the executive departments, and of all good citizens to do everything they can toward reducing the high cost of living, but I submit that the Congress would clearly fail in its duty in the matter if it were to so broaden a resolution such as we now have before us to cover a lot of inquiries that could not be carried on by the Federal Trade Commission in the next six months, which the Federal Trade Commission would not be justified in carrying on under a House resolution, and information relative to which we could not obtain from them if the commission did take up the inquiry until long after the period when we hope that the high cost of living will be largely overcome.

I am sure gentlemen will not attempt to appeal to their constituencies through seeming to be in favor of the reduction of the high cost of living by proposing to load on the Federal Trade Commission a lot of examinations that the House acting alone has no authority to ask them to make, and which they can not make, if we did ask them in the proper way, within time to do any good. This is not the time, I submit, to demagogue in regard to this or any other matter related to the high cost of living. We have a specific matter before us. We can secure promptly, let us hope, some further information in regard to one important subject. We can later, and after proper consideration, take up other matters, but for the time our duty is to pass this resolution and get some information in regard to shoes and the facts and factors relative to their cost. And, therefore, as I see it, it is the duty of the House to adopt the committee amendments, to vote down all other amendments, and to adopt the resolution.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman think if we confine this resolution solely to the matter of shoes that the public would be likely to say, "What is the matter with the cost of food and clothing, and why pick on shoes?"

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the gentleman's constituency, but I do know mine. I assume that they realize that when I act that I am attempting to do my duty. My opinion of the constituency of the gentleman who has just spoken is that they will much more highly regard him if he sticks to the text and votes to accomplish something that can be immediately accomplished, rather than to so broaden and scatter and load down the proposed investigation that the Federal Trade Commission will never get anywhere with it within any reasonable time. You can not fool the American people. They are pretty intelligent folks, and they understand situations quite as well as we do, and nobody will be fooled because some gentlemen attempt to load down a resolution that we may reasonably hope will accomplish something helpful if passed unamended, with a lot of propositions that will complicate the situation, lead nowhere in the early ascertainment of facts, and therefore accomplish no good in the reduction of the high cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the previous question on the resolution and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer a preferential amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do it, of course, after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Speaker is going to put the amendments to the House, is he not?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but the previous question has been ordered and no amendment can be offered now.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is it possible one can not offer a preferential amendment to perfect the text?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could have done it before the previous question was ordered. The gentleman is sufficiently familiar with parliamentary law to know that the adoption of the previous question precludes the offering of an amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think I understand the meaning of the previous question, but I do not imagine now that it prohibits me from offering an amendment to perfect the text. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Am I right that there are two amendments pending, a committee amendment and an amendment that was offered to include an inquiry as to clothing and food?

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment offered except the committee amendments.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the Clerk whether any other amendment has been offered except the committee amendments. The Clerk informs the Chair that there has not been.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Ohio, as I understood it, offered an amendment and clearly stated his amendment. After the gentleman had concluded his remarks I rose, and the first thing I said was, "I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio"; so that my memory is clear as to the offering of the amendment by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Ohio never offered any amendment. He said he was going to offer one.

Mr. EMERSON. I said that I moved, in line 3, after the word "shoes," to add "clothing and food products."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Notwithstanding he said that he was going to offer the amendment, he never did offer it, and the gentleman from New York was advocating a thing that had never been offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is clear, and his opinion coincides with that of the gentleman from Missouri. The Clerk also makes the same statement.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] rose and talked in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may have discussed the proposition, but never formally offered the amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. I certainly did.

Mr. GARNER. It is true that he may have made a motion, but unless the amendment was reported from the desk it is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. Of course not. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. May I make a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. EMERSON. At what time?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman would have to be opposed to the resolution to offer the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he would recognize the gentleman. The gentleman can make the motion.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with the request that they report it back immediately with the following amendment:

After the word "shoes," in line 3, add "clothing and food products."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. One moment. And on line 4, after the word "manufacturers," insert the words "or producers."

Mr. EMERSON. I accept that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EMERSON offers a motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the resolution back forthwith, with the following amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "shoes," insert the words "clothing and food products," and on page 1, line 4, after the word "manufacturers," insert the words "or producers."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] to recommit the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 79.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 19, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting a report of the commission in response to resolution No. 71 of the House of Representatives, dated June 5, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 190); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Coast and Geodetic Survey of that department, together with an alternative estimate to provide for increase in compensation of certain employees of that bureau (H. Doc. No. 191); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the office of the Treasurer of the United States, national currency, reimbursable, this amount to be reimbursed by the National and Federal reserve banks (H. Doc. No. 192); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CURRY of California, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7417) to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 231), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5976) granting an increase of pension to Thomas D. O'Shea, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: A bill (H. R. 8477) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Rumford, Me., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8478) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Camden, Me., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 8479) to establish a division for the investigation of mentally handicapped children in the schools; to the Committee on Appropriations.

R. 8496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, to certain widows and former widows, and certain helpless and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors, and to certain Army nurses; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'CONNOR: A bill (H. R. 8497) to reduce night work in post offices; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 8498) authorizing a military merit badge and additional pay based thereon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8499) to authorize the Secretary of War to produce and to sell duplicate negatives and prints of motion pictures and prints, lantern slides, and enlargements of still pictures in the possession and control of the War Department; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SIEGEL: Resolution (H. Res. 244) providing for an inquiry by the Federal Trade Commission into the proposed increase in the price on men's collars; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. VAILE: Resolution (H. Res. 245) providing for investigation and report by the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, or its appropriate subcommittee, as to the general conditions, treatment, and care of soldiers who are now or who have been patients at the United States General Hospital No. 21, Denver, Colo.; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin: Memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin urging the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing adequate compensation for soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war against Germany, Austria, and their allies; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, urging the Congress of the United States to work for vocational rehabilitation among our wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, urging the Congress of the United States to pass the bill introduced by the Hon. MARVIN JONES relating to recognition of the services of soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAMPERT: Memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, urging the Congress of the United States to continue the work of vocational rehabilitation among our wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: Memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, urging the Congress of the United States to continue the work of vocational rehabilitation among our wounded and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 8500) granting an increase of pension to Nathaniel Haycock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8501) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Hawk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8502) granting an increase of pension to Leonard Tressel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8503) granting an increase of pension to Arthur Orwig; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BARKLEY: A bill (H. R. 8504) granting an increase of pension to James King; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to offer a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. BLANTON. Is there anything of higher privilege than the veto message of the President of the United States before Congress? I notice from the roll call that the gang are all here from New York, Philadelphia, and Boston; but they are not here from the forks of the creek. I move that the President's veto be deferred until next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not in order at present, inasmuch as the previous question has been ordered on the motion of yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not a veto message from the President of the United States concerning certain legislation pending before Congress of the highest privilege?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask recognition to offer a motion concerning that veto message.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is out of order.

PRICE OF SHOES, SUGAR, CLOTHING, AND COFFEE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, House resolution 217, which was pending when the House adjourned last night, on which the previous question was ordered. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read the title of House resolution 217, directing the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into the proposed increase in the price of shoes and the increased price of sugar, clothing, and coffee.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last night a motion to recommit was pending, and on that the previous question had been ordered, as well as on the resolution. So the first question is on the motion to recommit. The Chair thinks that considering the circumstances the motion to recommit should be reported, and unless there is objection the motion to recommit will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EMERSON moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the resolution back forthwith, with the following amendments: Page 1, line 3, after the word "shoes," insert the words "clothing and food products," and on page 1, line 4, after the word "manufacturers," insert the words "or producers."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title may be amended to conform to the text.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

On motion of Mr. IGOE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been assigned the pleasant duty of announcing to the House that the Hon. KING SWOPE, Member elect from the eighth Kentucky district, successor to our late lamented colleague, Hon. Harvey Helm, is present. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to take the oath of office. His credentials have not yet arrived because under the law of Kentucky our State board of election commissioners could not meet until yesterday to canvass the vote, but his majority was over 1,700 and there is no question about his election. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his colleague elect, Mr. SWOPE, be sworn in, although his credentials have not yet arrived. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWOPE appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks made yesterday on House resolution 217, which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW—VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return this bill, H. R. 3854, "An act for the repeal of the daylight-saving law," without my signature, but do so with the utmost reluctance. I realize the very considerable and in some respects very serious inconveniences to which the daylight-saving law subjects the farmers of the country, to whom we owe the greatest consideration and who have distinguished themselves during these recent years of war and want by patriotic endeavors worthy of all praise. But I have been obliged to balance one set of disadvantages against another and to venture a judgment as to which were the more serious for the country. The immediate and pressing need of the country is production, increased and increasing production, in all lines of industry. The disorganization and dislocation caused by the war have told nowhere so heavily as at the industrial centers—in manufacture and in the many industries to which the country and the whole world must look to supply needs which can not be ignored or postponed. It is to these that the daylight-saving law is of most service. It ministers to economy and to efficiency. And the interest of the farmer is not in all respects separated from these interests. He needs what the factories produce along with the rest of the world. He is profited by the prosperity which their success brings about. His own life and methods are more easily adjusted, I venture to think, than are those of the manufacturer and the merchant.

These are the considerations which have led me to withhold my signature from this repeal. I hope that they are considerations which will appeal to the thoughtful judgment of the House and in the long run to the thoughtful judgment of the farmers of the country, who have always shown an admirable public spirit.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
15 August, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion——

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether any extended debate is desired, in fact necessary, on the veto message—— [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the message.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where a Member seeks to make a privileged motion concerning a veto message of the President of the United States, is he not entitled to recognition by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for recognition to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. BLANTON. My motion is to defer action on the veto message of the President of the United States until Monday.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, that is not a privileged motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that any motion to defer action is privileged.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged motion, but the gentleman can not take a Member off the floor in order to make that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Member was not on the floor when I asked for recognition of the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I asked recognition and made the privileged motion before the gentleman rose from his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to make his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, the daylight savers, some of whom are night wasters, are all here, and we want all of our Members here who believe in protecting the interests of the farmers, who are the real producers of our Nation.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not debate his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the motion to defer action on the President's veto message until next Monday, and upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin was recognized and had moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in the confusion did not hear the gentleman move the previous question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] began a statement about the message and then moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The situation is this: The Chair laid before the House the veto message of the President, and, of course, upon that the question was pending, Shall the House consider the bill? There are three motions which are privileged, one of which is the motion the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made. Of course, if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] had moved the previous question, that was in order and would take precedence.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I was clamoring for recognition to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will suspend.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] after having suggested that there might be debate, if it was desired, in response to clamorous calls of "Vote," made the motion for the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. And I raised the point of order.

The SPEAKER. If that is so, the Chair was not aware of it at the time, owing to the confusion.

Mr. MONDELL. Everyone about the gentleman from Wisconsin heard him make the motion.

The SPEAKER. If that is true, the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to recognition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I raised the point of order before the gentleman ever made his motion and asked for recognition on the previous question.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask for a reading of the reporter's notes, which will show the fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, of course, would be entitled to recognition if the Chair recognized him; but the Chair preferred to recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin, as he had the right, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin made, as he states, which the Chair did not hear, the motion for the previous question, it was in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. A veto message is received by the House from the President of the United States and submitted to the House, and where the Speaker's attention is directed to the fact that a Member of the House seeks to make a privileged motion, namely, to defer action thereon, before any Member is recognized by the Chair, and that is brought home to the attention of the Speaker, is not the Member who intends to make the privileged motion entitled to recognition before a Member can move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. He certainly is not. The gentleman in charge of the bill is entitled to prior recognition [applause], and if he moves the previous question that comes first.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion for the previous question on the veto message of the President for reconsideration of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If the House sees fit, or if, in other words, the proponents of the repeal of the daylight-saving law see fit, in order to save the repeal, to vote down the previous question, they can do it. I believe that we have a sufficient vote here now to pass this repeal over the President's veto, but it is such an important matter we can not afford to take chances. Three of our Texas Members and numerous other proponents of repeal are absent at this time.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking——

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KING. I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion to postpone action upon this message until next Tuesday, and upon the ground, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of a President's message is privileged, and under the rules of this House a motion to postpone to a day certain is privileged.

The SPEAKER. Certainly it is. Also a motion for the previous question is privileged, and if the House wishes to vote down the previous question, then, of course, other privileged motions can come up; but if the House adopts the previous question——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet a moment ago for the purpose of interrogating the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order.

Mr. RUBEY. I would like to ask for one minute in order that I may interrogate the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. Did I understand the gentleman was recognized to make a motion that this be postponed?

The SPEAKER. He is not recognized for that purpose. The question before the House is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?—and on that the gentleman from Wisconsin moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and Mr. KING) there were—ayes 225, noes 34.

Mr. BLANTON. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Six gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. On that the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to 20 minutes if he so desires—— [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; there was debate before moving the previous question, which cuts off further debate.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to commit the bill and message to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That is in order after the previous question.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question has been ordered that would not be in order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, that is the only motion that is in order—to recommit. Why, it is a recommittal; that is what it is, certainly.

The SPEAKER. Why, the President's veto has never been in the committee.

Mr. WINGO. The bill has been in the committee, and the bill carries with it the accompanying papers and the veto. The bill is the substantive proposition before the House. We are reconsidering a bill, and I am moving to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce under Rule XVII, which says a motion to commit may be made on any question either before or after the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that clearly is not in order. A motion to commit was in order, but——

Mr. WINGO. I am not moving to commit the President's message; his message is not before the House now. The House is reconsidering a bill, and the rules plainly provide that after the previous question is ordered you can move to recommit a bill, and I am moving to recommit the bill to a committee, which the rules plainly provide may be made after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that the question before the House and upon which the previous question has been ordered is the question of the veto of the President? The previous question is not ordered on the bill, but it has been ordered upon the proposition of the President's veto.

The SPEAKER. On reconsidering the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding. The Chair thinks the gentleman's motion is not in order. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the veto has nothing to do with the parliamentary situation. The veto has served its purpose, and, as one Speaker has ruled, is now history. We are proceeding, as the Constitution provides we shall, to reconsider a bill. Now, the rule plainly provides that after the previous question is ordered one motion to recommit shall be in order. I am not talking about the veto. I am not asking that the veto go to the committee, because it is not necessary. We are considering a bill, and the rule plainly provides that one motion to recommit a bill may be made even after the previous question is ordered. And I am sure if the Chair will examine the rule he will find that that is true.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad if the gentleman will refer him to any precedent.

Mr. WINGO. Read Rule XVII. The Chair is confusing this proceeding with the disposition of a veto message. My motion does not go to the veto message, but to the pending question, which is the passage of a bill on reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the precedents——

Mr. WINGO. The effect of the President's veto is to put the bill back to where it was immediately when the bill first came up for the consideration of the House. In other words, the veto of the President, under the Constitution, puts the bill back in the House for consideration. Now, the veto has served its office. It is dead, so far as the parliamentary situation is concerned, and is now history. And when the House took up the consideration of the bill the parliamentary status was the very same as it was the day the House originally considered the bill when it came from the committee, except it can not be amended. In other words, the House is proceeding to the consideration of a bill. Now, the President's veto does not affect the parliamentary status. It has served its office—that is, to force the House to take up, de novo, the bill as vetoed, and that is what we have done. No one will seriously contend if this were the first time we were considering the bill that we would not have the right to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman, inasmuch as the gentleman referred to the precedents, that in the Manual, page 32, it says:

> While the ordinary motion to refer may be applied to a vetoed bill, it is not in order to move to recommit it pending the demand for the previous question or after it is ordered.

Mr. WINGO. The decision cited does not bear out the syllabus. I move, then, to refer the bill, Mr. Speaker, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think a motion to refer is in order after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. WINGO. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it is not in order to move to refer a bill after the previous question is ordered, and the gentleman from Arkansas appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. WINGO. And on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On that motion the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of demanding the yeas and nays will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Four gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 214, noes 5.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. A quorum was counted on the last vote. The ayes were 214 and the noes 5.

Mr. WINGO. I understood the Chair to say 142. Of course, with the vote as stated there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? That vote, under the Constitution, will have to be taken by the yeas and nays. Those who are in favor of passing the bill over the President's veto will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 101, answered "present" 1, not voting 106, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded and was greeted with applause.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the vote whereby the bill was passed over the President's veto be reconsidered, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. SEARS. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that motion is not in order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BLACK, at the request of Mr. JONES of Texas, for five days, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, at the request of Mr. JONES of Texas, for five days, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, at the request of Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, for the remainder of this week, on account of the death of his mother; and

To Mr. WRIGHT, at the request of Mr. CRISP, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

POTATO FLOUR AND STARCH.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I submit the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means has made the following report to accompany the bill (H. R. 6814) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of potato flour and potato starch in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

TUNGSTEN ORES IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437; and, pending that motion, I wish to arrange as to general debate with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437; and, pending that——

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to see what length of general debate the gentleman from North Carolina desires.

Mr. KITCHIN. One gentleman on this side desires 40 minutes, and others desire about an hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not believe that we want to consume that much time over here. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that we have an hour and 20 minutes on this side and debate for 3 hours, 1 hour and 20 minutes to be controlled by myself and 1 hour and 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. And, pending that motion, the gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to 3 hours—1 hour and 20 minutes to be controlled by himself and 1 hour and 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan when was the bill ordered reported out from committee that he reported a moment ago? I was not here when the report was submitted.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was reported out and authorized by the committee before we recessed—that is, 10 days or 2 weeks ago. I then offered a report, but it was shut out by some motion. We did not file the report until now.

Mr. GARNER. I did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time, so that I did not know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the special order the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has 1 hour and 20 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHEN] has 1 hour and 40 minutes. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw a petition filed some weeks ago in the House, addressed to the Congress and to the President, relating to the return of our troops from Siberia. There is a committee from the State of Illinois coming to Washington to-night who hope to see the President within a day or two, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this petition in order that they may have it to present to the President.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think that will have to be done in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that can not be done in Committee of the Whole. That action will have to be taken by the House.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to occupy some of his time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I be not interrupted until I have completed my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks that he be not interrupted until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the many resolutions that have been offered in this body asking for an investigation, both as to the scarcity and price of sugar, I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I give a few facts and figures which may throw some light upon existing conditions in the sugar market.

That there has been profiteering in sugar, just as there has been in other foods and commodities during the late war and since the signing of the armistice, no one will deny, but the record will show that the public has been fleeced not by the sugar producer but by the wholesale and retail dealers in sugar.

During the fall of 1918 the cane and beet sugar producers of this country entered into a written agreement with the United States Food Administration, by the terms of which the producers agreed to sell their sugar at a price to be fixed and determined by the Food Administration. At the time that this contract was signed no price had been agreed upon and it was left to the Food Administration to fix a price which would, in its opinion, be fair both to the producers and the consumers. The producers also agreed to sell and distribute their sugar in such manner as the Food Administration might direct.

In other words, the sugar producers of this country voluntarily placed themselves absolutely in the hands of the Food Administration, agreeing and binding themselves to sell their sugars for such price and at such time and place as might be designated by the Food Administration.

Subsequently the Food Administration fixed a basic maximum price of 9 cents a pound for fine granulated sugars and provided for a differential on all sugars of an inferior grade—nearly all of which are manufactured in Louisiana—of from 20 cents to $1.20 a hundred pounds. These prices were f. o. b. seaboard points, with the customary discount of 2 per cent for cash, thus making the price of refined and plantation granulated sugars 8.82 cents per pound. Other direct-consumption sugars made in Louisiana were marketed at from 8.20 to 8.70 cents per pound, while second and third sugars sold at from 6.5 to 7.2 cents per pound.

The differentials on the various grades of sugar made in Louisiana will be found in the written agreement made with the Louisiana producers, which I shall ask leave to print in connection with my remarks.

It is provided that this agreement shall remain in full force and effect from October 1, 1918, until the final disposition of the crop of the season of 1918–19 and for each succeeding year thereafter until the existing state of war between this country and Germany shall have terminated, as evidenced by the proclamation of the President, provided that either party may withdraw from the contract after the disposition of the crop of 1918–19 by giving 30 days' written notice to that effect before October 1, 1919.

This agreement was signed by every sugar producer in the State of Louisiana and has been patriotically lived up to both in letter and in spirit, even though its fulfillment in many instances demanded additional equipment and was followed up by so many rules and regulations emanating from the Food Administration relative to the shipping, marketing, and distribution of the sugars that the sugar producers of this country will breathe a sigh of relief when the provisions of this control are no longer in force and effect.

Under authority given in the Lever food-control act the United States Food Administration, on July 3, 1918, fixed the profit of the wholesale dealer in sugar at 0.25 cent per pound and that of the retailer at 1 cent per pound, but this was amended later on so as to permit the wholesaler to realize from 0.15 to 0.35 cent per pound and the retailer to realize a profit of 1½ cents per pound. By adding these prices to the maximum price fixed under contract for the refined article—that is to say, 9 cents less 2 per cent for cash—it will be found that the maximum price which the consumers of this country were called on to pay for their sugar was from 10 to 11 cents per pound, and the Department of Justice has recently held that 11 cents is a fair retail price for sugar and that all dealers charging more will be investigated.

And, as a matter of fact, sugar was sold to the consumer at these prices until January 14, 1919, when for some unaccountable reason the rule issued by the Food Administration regulating the profits of the wholesale and retail dealers in sugar was canceled and annulled.

It will therefore appear that after January 14, 1919, the wholesale and retail dealers were permitted to fix the price at which they would dispose of their sugars, while the producers were under contract with the Government not to sell any of their product at a price exceeding 9 cents per pound.

With a scarcity of sugar prevailing, is it any wonder that dealers in sugar have taken advantage of the fact that the rule regulating the price at which sugar should be sold at wholesale and retail had been canceled, thereby giving them a free hand to profiteer in sugar as well as in other commodities and necessities of life?

If press reports are to be believed, dealers in sugar have not been slow to take advantage of this situation.

A few weeks ago sugar was sold by some grocers in Washington at 13½ cents per pound, or 2 pounds for 27 cents, and a press report from Pittsburgh appearing in the Washington Post on August 7 states that three wholesale sugar dealers had been arrested by agents of the Department of Justice for selling sugar at wholesale for 14 cents per pound, while in Chicago it was retailing for as high as 16 cents per pound.

This is profiteering with a vengeance, and it is to be hoped that these parties can be held, convicted, and severely punished for having thus imposed upon the public.

Think of it, Mr. Chairman, the sugar producers and refiners of this country are under contract with this Government to dispose of their entire output during the year 1919 for the maximum price of 9 cents per pound, less 2 per cent for cash, and yet some dealers in this country, taking advantage of the scarcity of sugar, are holding up the public and making the enormous profit of more than 5 cents per pound, or $5 per hundred pounds and $17.50 per barrel.

It takes the sugar farmer of this country 12 months to grow and harvest his cane or beets and manufacture the same into sugar. He has an enormous investment of capital and takes the risk of freezes, overflows, and unfavorable seasons, which are often followed by large financial losses. And yet when the dealers of this country sell sugar at 14 cents per pound, thereby making a profit of more than 5 cents per pound, they are making from five to ten times as much profit as the farmer, who has produced the sugar at great risk and by the sweat of his brow.

But this is not all, Mr. Chairman. When the housewife goes to the grocer to buy her sugar and she is made to pay an exorbitant price for it, her wrath and criticism is visited not upon the grocer but upon the producer, whom she is lead to believe is responsible for the high price of the sugar.

That some Members of Congress are laboring under the same hallucination as the housewife is shown by the fact that some bills have been introduced looking to the repeal of the present duty on sugar.

I feel sure, however, that these bills are meant merely for home consumption, as any thoughtful man knows that to now remove the duty on sugar and thereby discourage its production in this country would not relieve the present situation either as to quantity or price.

That the price of sugar has not increased in the same proportion as other commodities was brought out in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Manufactures when it was investigating the shortage of sugar and coal last winter.

At that hearing, Mr. Claus Spreckels, a refiner, produced a letter written by Mr. George M. Rolph in December, 1917, at which time Mr. Rolph was at the head of the Sugar Division of the Food Administration, in which he makes this statement:

> Taking the value of other products and comparing the prewar prices with the present to ascertain what price should obtain for raw sugars on the same ratio, the showing would be as follows:
>
> Cotton at 25 cents per pound, sugar should be worth 11½ cents per pound.
> Cottonseed meal at $67 per ton, sugar should be worth 10 cents per pound.
> Cowpeas at $3.25 per bushel, sugar should be worth 12.7 cents per pound.
> Wheat at $2.20 per bushel, sugar should be worth 10 cents per pound.

It is important to note that in making his comparisons, Mr. Rolph takes raw sugar instead of the refined article. The price of raw sugar as fixed by the Food Administration is 7.28 cents, while that of refined sugar is 9 cents, less 2 per cent, the difference between the two representing the cost of refining. So that to the average comparative prices given on sugar by Mr. Rolph, 11.03 cents, must be added 1.54 cents, which would put the price of refined sugars at 12.57 cents f. o. b. seaboard points. To this would have to be added the profits of the wholesaler and retailer, amounting to from 1.5 to 2 cents per pound, which would mean, according to Mr. Rolph, that in comparison to the prices of the products cited by him in his letter, sugar should retail at between 14 and 15 cents per pound.

It should also be noted that the prices of most of the articles selected by Mr. Rolph for comparison with sugar have increased considerably in price since his letter was written.

SCARCITY OF SUGAR.

There is now pending on the House Calendar a resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], directing the Federal Trade Commission to institute an immediate investigation and report to the House its findings on the cause of the present scarcity of sugar and the reasonableness of the wholesale and retail prices of that article.

This resolution was taken up for consideration before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on July 14 and was favorably reported to the House on August 5.

While I regret that I did not know when this resolution would be taken up by the committee for consideration, as I would have been pleased to have been in attendance, yet, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say as a representative of a sugar-producing district, that an investigation will be welcomed by the sugar producers of this country.

The facts will show that they are in no way responsible for the present apparent scarcity of sugar, and that they voluntarily and patriotically accepted for their sugars a price which was fixed and determined by this Government as being reasonable and fair and which did not yield excessive profits.

Several factors have contributed to the present scarcity of sugar in this country, but as a matter of fact there is a sufficient amount of sugar in sight to supply the demands of this country.

The domestic supply of sugar has long since been sold and distributed in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Food Administration, but the Cuban crop is by no means exhausted.

On the 24th day of October, 1918, the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation which was financed by the President for the purpose of acting as an agency of this Government in equalizing the distribution and selling price of sugar, purchased the entire crop of raw sugar made on the island of Cuba during the crop season of 1918–19. This crop, it is estimated by the Equalization Board, will exceed 4,100,000 tons. One third, or 1,300,000 tons, was alloted and sold by the Equalization Board to Great Britain, thus leaving 2,700,000 tons to be distributed in the United States. Of this, 1,700,000 tons had already been taken or shipped to the United States on July 1, leaving 1,000,000 tons of raw sugar in Cuba, which is the property of this Government and which is available for distribution in this country just as fast as it can be shipped and refined.

The factors which have contributed to the scarcity of sugar in this country are:

First, the simultaneous and sudden demand made for sugar by the big fruit canneries and confectionery factories, who failed to anticipate their normal demands and postponed ordering their usual supply of sugar with the hope that the price would be lowered. They knew that the refiners under their contract could not sell above the fixed price of 9 cents, and believing that the control and price of sugar by the Government would be discontinued now that the emergency is over, they held off from purchasing their necessary supplies, and then deluged the refiners with orders that it was impossible to meet.

Second, the limited capacity of the sugar refineries. The combined capacity of the 22 refineries in this country is 4,800,000 tons, while the consumption is approximately 4,250,000 tons. In addition to supplying the domestic trade, the refineries have been called upon to supply our Allies, and large quantities of sugar have been refined in this country and shipped to Great Britain and other European countries, so that when the canners and confectioners made their sudden demand for sugar the stock of the refineries was soon exhausted and a shortage followed.

Third, the strike by the marine unions of New York City, which held Cuban and Porto Rican sugar carriers at Atlantic and Gulf ports for three weeks. Happily, this strike was settled on July 30, but not before it had materially affected the receipts and output of sugar at many of the refineries, some of which were forced to reduce their meltings for several days from 25 to 50 per cent.

There does not appear to be any disposition to hoard sugar to any extent, but this is now being investigated by the Department of Justice.

In justice to the Sugar Equalization Board, permit me to say that they have done everything possible to meet the situation and relieve the sugar shortage.

An embargo on exports of sugar to European countries was declared, and the combined output of all the refineries is now being put into domestic channels of trade.

In addition to this the Sugar Equalization Board has recently distributed for the War Department some 37,000,000 pounds of sugar, and has distributed the same where it will give greatest relief, and has sold it to the trade at the fixed price of 9 cents per pound, less 2 per cent for cash.

The situation brought about by the marine strike was met as far as possible by pressing into service all vessels that could be reached by radio and diverting them to Cuba to bring back raw sugar.

It takes a vessel three weeks to make the round trip from New York to Cuba, so that the effect of the marine strike will have disappeared by the last of August, and we should then be receiving Cuban raw sugars at the rate of 300,000 tons per month, which will relieve the shortage until our domestic product is placed on the market.

The resolution introduced in the House by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] to repeal all duty upon sugar would accomplish no good purpose and would neither affect the price of sugar nor increase the amount of sugar we are now receiving in this country. It is evident that Mr. EMERSON was under the impression that the removal of the customs duty would result in the importation of foreign-grown sugars.

The fact of the matter is that every other sugar-consuming nation is suffering from the scarcity of sugar much more than the United States. Aside from that which the United States and Great Britain control by the purchase of the entire Cuban crop there is but a small surplus of sugar in other countries, and where a surplus does exist exorbitant prices are being demanded.

The important thing to be accomplished at this time is to hold on to what sugars we have, and the Sugar Equalization Board has met this situation by placing an embargo on further shipments of sugar abroad.

In an Associated Press dispatch from Paris appearing in the Washington Star on July 18 the sugar situation in France is summed up as follows:

French food officials, it was explained, were given an option last fall on as large a proportion of the Cuban sugar crop as they wished. The French, however, took only about 31 per cent of the crop, although American officials warned them of an impending world sugar shortage. Now that the French face a serious sugar deficit they are seeking an American supply, where prices are lower than elsewhere. Sugar is available in Czechoslovakia, but the Czechs are asking 25 cents a pound. Stocks are available elsewhere, but at prices far higher than in the United States.

It would seem, therefore, that the French are seeking this market not so much because sugar can not be found elsewhere but because sugar is selling in this country for less than one-half the price that it can be purchased from any other source.

As a matter of fact, sugar is selling cheaper in this country than in any other part of the world, due alone to the fact that the domestic and Cuban producers and refiners are under contract with this Government. Strike these contracts out of existence and the price of sugar on the market to-day would be more than double that fixed by the Food Administration.

In testifying before the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate last winter, when that body was holding hearings on Senate resolution 163, relative to the shortage of sugar and coal, the Hon. Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator, made this statement in regard to the agreements and contracts made with the sugar producers of this country:

Supposing that we had made no agreement with him, during this shortage he would probably have sold his sugar at 25 to 30 cents a pound.

Those of you who remember the sugar shortage of last winter, when the consumption of sugar was limited to 2 and 3 pounds per capita, will not doubt the statement of Mr. Hoover.

It was at this time that the sugar and beet crops were being marketed and the producers were receiving less than 9 cents a pound for their sugars.

Taking the lesser figure given by Mr. Hoover, and say that sugar would have sold at 25 cents a pound without Government control, it will be found that the amount saved to the consumers of this country and lost to the producers is almost staggering.

The difference between the price fixed by the Food Administration—9 cents—and that for which Mr. Hoover said sugar would have sold without his control—25 cents—shows a difference of 16 cents a pound, or a difference of $320 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

Louisiana and Texas produced 284,000 tons of sugar, while the beet-sugar farmers produced approximately 800,000 tons, so that the cane-sugar producers lost by reason of their contracts and the resulting control of price by the Food Administration $90,880,000, while the beet-sugar producers lost $256,000,000, or a total loss to the sugar producers of this country of $346,880,000.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the face of these figures the consumers of this country are without reason to complain as to the price of sugar as fixed by the Food Administration, but that if complaint there be it should come from the sugar producers of this country who voluntarily sacrificed millions of dollars to aid their country in the winning of the war.

I say "voluntarily," because the control of sugar was not contemplated by the Lever food bill, as this act specifically states that its provisions shall not apply to any farmer or gardener or other person with respect to the products of any farm or garden or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

SUGAR OUTLOOK AS TO SUPPLY AND PRICES.

A careful analysis of the threatened world shortage discloses the following facts: The sugar production of the world for the season of 1918–1919 amounted to 16,350,400 long tons, of which 12,010,644 tons is cane sugars and 4,339,856 beet sugars. This shows an estimated decrease in the world's production of 982,555 tons.

There is no question but that the world is now short of sugar and has been short all of the present year. It follows, therefore, that with the restrictions removed as to the consumption of sugar in this and other countries, this shortage will be accentuated another year, unless there is a considerable increase in production.

The English colonies will undoubtedly produce more sugar than they have done since prewar times. The British West Indies last year produced 210,000 tons, but this is far short of England's needs, and during the coming year she will again rely largely upon Cuban and American sugars for her necessary supply.

The sugar-producing colonies of Great Britain have recently been called upon by that Government for a statement as to their relative capacity for sugar production, and the colonists are insisting that the British Government shall so adjust any scheme of sugar duties that it may put in force as to give a preference to the British colonies. Canada has for some years had a preferential arrangement with the West Indian colonies to the extent of 15 per cent of the duties, and the colonies are now demanding similar treatment at the hands of the British Government. England usually takes care of her own, and I believe it safe to say that the production of sugar in the British colonies will be materially increased during the coming year.

The French colonies only produce some 60,000 tons of sugar, and are a very small factor in meeting the demands of that country.

Previous to the war the French were extensive producers of beet sugars, but their beet fields were overrun by the Huns in the late war and all of their factories were destroyed, and it will take several years before France can reestablish this industry. France, like England, is looking to Cuba and the American refiners for her sugar supply.

The same may be said of Italy and Belgium, but the fact that these countries will be called upon to pay for their sugars in American money or securities will deter them from buying any large quantity of sugar, and they will probably remain on a restricted basis for the next year or two.

Germany before the war was a large producer and exporter of beet sugar, and, in fact, took care of most of the European demands, and while her sugar output during the war was reduced to a point where it only took care of local consumption, yet her fields and her factories are still intact and my information is that she will have some sugars for export the coming season.

Russia was likewise a large producer and exporter of beet sugars, but she is now cut off from the rest of the world and her internal troubles have demoralized the industry and she will not be an important factor in supplying the world with sugar.

While Mexico and some of the South American countries produce cane sugar, it is mostly consumed locally and will play no part in rendering much-needed assistance to those countries suffering from a sugar famine.

On the other hand, with few exceptions, those sugar-producing countries that were not affected by the ravages of war have increased their production by leaps and bounds.

The great demand for sugar and the increased price have stimulated production in Cuba more than 33 per cent in two years. For the season of 1916–17 the tonnage production was slightly over three million, in 1917–18 it was nearly three and one-half million, and in 1918–19 it exceeded 4,000,000 tons. If this same percentage of increase continues Cuba will produce four and one-half million tons for the season of 1919–20.

Java produced last year 1,333,613 tons, of which 430,000 tons went to Europe and the balance was distributed chiefly in the Orient. Previous to the outbreak of the war much of the Java sugar came to this country, but importation stopped on the outbreak of the war and we have received little, if any, Java sugar since 1914. Java's production for 1919–20 is expected to reach 1,600,000 tons.

Formosa produced 400,000 tons in 1918, with the promise of a material increase this year. These sugars are refined in Japan and are consumed in that country and in China.

The Dominican Republic produced a banner crop last year of 165,000 tons, and promises to increase her output this season.

In the United States the prospects are not so encouraging. Both the cane and beet sugar crops have suffered from shortage of labor and unfavorable weather conditions.

The latest Government report on the Louisiana crop, dated August 8, estimated the coming crop of sugar at 152,463 tons, as against 280,900 tons last season, a decrease of more than 40 per cent. The best information obtainable as to the beet-sugar production is that it will not exceed 700,000 tons, which is a decrease of about 100,000 tons. Reports from our insular possessions are to the effect that next year's crop will equal if not exceed the crop of this year.

The total sugar supply of the United States and its insular possessions may therefore be estimated as follows:

Louisiana cane sugars	152,463
Texas cane sugars	4,000
Porto Rico	400,000
Hawaiian Islands	576,000
Philippine Islands	150,000
Beet sugars	700,000
Total	1,982,463

The total supply of the United States and its insular possessions will therefore be about 1,982,463 tons.

The per capita consumption of sugar last year was 77 pounds, and was highest in 1914, when it reached 89 pounds. It would be safe to say, therefore, that our consumption next year will not exceed 85 pounds.

Estimating our population at 105,000,000, it will be found that the probable consumption of sugar next year will be 4,400,000 short tons.

Adopting the estimate made on the Cuban crop (4,500,000 tons) and that of the United States and its possessions (1,982,463 tons), we have 6,482,463 tons of sugar that will either be made or refined in this country, or a surplus over and above our own needs of 2,082,463 tons, which can be shipped to Europe and absorbed by the countries now suffering from a sugar shortage.

I do not, therefore, anticipate such a world shortage in sugar as is being predicted by the press throughout this country, and if the European countries continue to limit and restrict the use of sugar there will be no shortage at all.

In any event, there is no danger of such a world shortage as will necessitate the enactment of any further laws looking to the control of sugar either as to price or distribution.

FUTURE PRICE OF SUGAR.

It is not practical at this time to predict what the price of sugar will be next year. But we do know that the sugar producers of this country can not afford to sell their sugars at the price fixed by the Food Administration for the crop of last season.

The scarcity and high price of labor, the increased cost of mules, agricultural implements, fertilizer, and every article that goes into the cultivation and manufacture of sugar, coupled with the extreme wet weather that has prevailed for more than a year, will make the Louisiana crop the most expensive one ever grown in that State.

While the prices of last year yielded a fair margin of profit to most of the sugar producers, there were yet some who actually lost money, and for any sugar farmers to show a profit this season they must have a considerable advance in the price of sugar. This would not necessarily mean any material increase to the consumer, if the wholesaler and retailer are held down to legitimate profits.

Some idea of the rise in cost of producing sugar in this country may be gained from a study of the following table quoted from Tariff Information, series No. 9, of the United States Tariff Commission, entitled "Cost of production in sugar industry," published in 1919.

TABLE XV.—Wages and prices of sundry items used in the production of sugar for the years indicated, together with the percentage rates of increase.

	1913–14	1917–18		1918–19
	Amount.	Amount.	Increase per cent over 1913–14.	Amount.	Increase per cent over 1917–18.	Increase per cent over prewar.
Wages per day:
Mill laborers	$2.24	$3.24	45	$4.24	31	89
Sugar boilers	4.22	5.27	25	6.36	21	51
Prices:
Beets, per ton	6.47	9.12	41	11.99	31	85
Coal, per ton	2.49	3.71	49	4.08	10	64
Coke, per ton	6.86	9.82	43	13.49	37	97
Fuel oil, per barrel	.77	.94	22	1.67	78	117
Lime rock, per ton	2.32	2.82	22	3.51	25	51
Sugar bags, each	.13	.16	23	.43	169	231
Sugar barrels, each	.46	.60	30	.99	65	115
Filter cloth, per yard	.16	.18	12	.57	217	256

The above table does not cover all of the cost items in the manufacture of beet sugar, but it is sufficient to show the general increase in the cost of production brought about by war conditions.

This table of cost of production refers particularly to beet sugars, but the report of the Tariff Commission shows that the increase in the cost of production of cane sugars was in about the same proportion.

The price of refined sugar for the 1917–18 crop was fixed at 7.45 cents per pound and was increased to 9 cents, less 2 per cent for cash, for the crop of 1918–19. It will therefore be seen that this increase of 20 per cent was not at all unreasonable in view of the large increases in cost of the various items entering into the manufacture of the domestic product.

But as the cost of production and material has further increased since 1918, it follows that the domestic producer must receive an increased price for his sugar if the industry is to remain on a paying basis.

A recent press dispatch from Cuba indicates that the producers will demand a higher price for their sugars, and to this end are preparing to form a controlling committee of their own. The Cubans are disposed to give the United States first call on the coming crop, but they very justly feel that in view of the fact that other nations are willing to pay any price to secure a supply of sugar the United States should, in recognition of this fact, pay an increased price in the event that the purchase of the entire crop is again contemplated.

There is no question but what the Cubans hold the whip hand and that they are in a position to dictate prices, but at the same time they are not forgetful of the fact that their present position as the largest sugar-producing country of the world is due to the tariff preference given by the United States as against the duty collected on sugar from other foreign countries.

If the negotiations now in progress should result in this country again purchasing the entire Cuban crop, which would have the effect of fixing the price in this country, whether our domestic sugars are controlled or not, then, in marketing the Cuban crop, due regard should be given the fact that Cuban sugars are produced for approximately 2 cents per pound less than the domestic article.

CUBAN AND REFINERS' CONTRACTS.

As I have frequently referred to the contracts entered into by the Cuban producers by which they sold their entire output to the United States and to the contract which this Government, through the United States Sugar Equalization Board, also entered into with the refiners, fixing the refiners' margin and providing for the method of distributing sugars, it may not be out of place to review briefly the important provisions of these contracts. I shall, however, ask the consent of the House to print these contracts in full as a part of my remarks.

The purpose of both contracts was to provide for the equitable distribution of sugar to the American people, the Army, the Navy, as well as to protect the consumers against excessive prices for the same.

In the Cuban contract the basic price for 96° raw sugar was fixed at 5.50 cents per pound, plus 0.0385 freight, 0.02 insurance, and tariff 1.0048, making the delivered cost of sugar to the Sugar Equalization Board $6.90 per 100 pounds, to which was added 38 cents profit for the Equalization Board, making the sugar 7.28 cents per pound.

In the contract with the refiners it was determined that a differential of $1.54 per 100 pounds to the refiner to cover cost of refining, cooperage, distribution, and profit would be fair, thus making the price at the refinery 9 cents, less 2 per cent, or 8.82 cents net. This is the price at which the wholesaler receives his sugar f. o. b. refinery.

These two provisions construed together fix the price for American sugars, which price is in effect to-day just as it was in October last year and all succeeding months. It is definitely stated that the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) was created and is acting as agency for the United States for the purpose of equalizing the distribution and selling price of sugar.

Their contract as to distribution with the Cubans is that their entire crop shall be sold exclusively to the Sugar Equalization Board, and that it should be delivered at the rate of 2 per cent of the crop in December, 1918, and the entire balance in approximately equal monthly shipments from January to November, 1918, inclusive.

Article 4 of the refiners' contract makes provision for the distribution of the Cuban sugars and provides that the Equalization Board shall distribute the sugar among the refiners so as to meet their requirements in the proportions set forth in "Exhibit B," which is the proportionate refining capacity of the several refiners, thus making an equitable allotment of the sugar to the refiners, the refineries being situated geographically so that this could be done, there being refineries in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Savannah, New Orleans, and in California. The refiners agreed to accept the allotments as made and make equitable distribution of the sugar as refined. Ample protection was given to the requirements of the refiners relative to the supply of domestic, Hawaiian, Philippine, and Porto Rican raw sugars, so that the effect of the Cuban contract could be carried out in full, covering the other sugars named.

Provision was made in the Cuban contract for the handling of such sugars as were allotted to the royal commission of Great Britain, France, and Italy. Similar agreements were had with the refiners for the refining and delivery of such sugars to our Allies.

Under article 4 of the Cuban contract it was agreed that whatever the crop might be in volume, none of the 1918–19 crop should be exported from Cuba except under the contract, and that Cuba would enact such laws and promulgate such orders and decrees as were necessary to faithfully fulfill the stipulations and conditions aforesaid, fixing penalties for failure so to do.

In turn the contract with the refiners stipulates that they should purchase no raw sugars except from the Sugar Equilization Board, the board agreeing to sell them their entire requirements of raw sugars from the date of the contract to December 31, 1919, for the operation of their several refineries for such time as the respective refiners in their judgment determine.

All of the above stipulations are well and fully protected in minute details as to the operation of the contract between the Equilization Board and Cuban producers and the Equilization Board and the American refiners. Thus the supply of sugar was as nearly as could be anticipated fixed at a level flow, and a price to protect the consumer, which was fixed at the time of the signing of the contract, is in effect without change to-day.

FUTURE OF SUGAR IN THE UNITED STATES.

Stimulated by high prices, countries that were not engaged in the World War have greatly increased their production of sugar in order to meet the demands of those countries whose industries were either hampered or destroyed as a result of the war.

But a day of reckoning is coming.

When the peace treaty has been signed, when normal conditions have been restored, when the devastated and abandoned fields in France, Germany, Austria, and Russia are again brought under cultivation and are producing their normal amount of beet sugars, what, then, is to become of the domestic industry?

When the European countries have resumed their normal production of sugar there will be a tremendous surplus, and the Cuban sugar will have no market other than the United States.

I have already shown that with the Cuban crop of four and one-half million tons, there would be a surplus in this country of over 2,000,000 tons, and with Europe producing her own sugars the United States will be the dumping ground of the entire Cuban crop.

Unless our tariff laws are revised, these sugars will enter this country by the payment of a duty just a fraction over 1 cent per pound, and yet they are produced for 2 cents less per pound than domestic sugars.

If the domestic industry is to continue to exist and thrive in the United States, then there must be an increase of tariff for this industry, as well as for many others in this country.

This Great War and the resulting control of sugar prices has established the fact that the two great parties are at one as to the necessity and amount of protection which should be accorded domestic sugars.

Schedule E of the Payne-Aldrich bill fixes the tariff on Cuban 96° test sugars, after deducting the 20 per cent preferential, at 1.348 per pound, while the Underwood bill fixes the duty on the same sugars at 1.0048.

When conditions became such during the war as to make it necessary for this Democratic administration to control the distribution and price of food products in this country, a sugar division of the Food Administration was created and a committee selected which undertook to fix such a price on domestic sugars as would yield a fair margin of profit, and at the same time encourage the production of domestic sugars.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What has the gentleman to say regarding the assertion that has been frequently made here that the raising of sugar in Louisiana is a hothouse industry, like the raising of oranges in Maine?

Mr. MARTIN. It is no more a hothouse industry than the raising of beet sugar in the North. We now produce about one-half of the amount of sugar that is consumed in this country. To strike down the cane-sugar and beet-sugar industries would mean that we would be absolutely at the mercy of foreign producers, both as to price and supply.

After a thorough investigation as to the cost of production both in this country and Cuba, it was concluded that 5.50 for Cuban sugars would be a fair price, and this being acceptable to the Cubans the entire crop of that island was purchased by the United States Sugar Equalization Board for this Government.

Adding to this figure the existing duty of 1.0048 plus freight and insurance, amounting to 0.405 cent per pound, it will be found that under the contract of purchase made with the Cubans their sugars are delivered in New York at 6.90 cents per pound.

But an investigation of the domestic industry disclosed the fact that sugar could not be grown and manufactured in this country at this price, and that it would be necessary to give an increased price to the domestic producers. The difference arrived at by this committee after a full and fair investigation as to the cost of production was 0.38 cent per pound, and this was accordingly added to the Cuban price of 6.90, thus fixing the price of domestic raw sugars at 7.28 cents per pound.

This 0.38 cent is, in effect, an additional duty exacted from the Cubans, made necessary in order to protect the domestic industry.

This additional duty added to 1.0048 fixed in the Underwood bill places the protection which this administration deems fair and adequate as against Cuban sugars at 1.3848, while the Payne-Aldrich bill fixes the duty at 1.348, or at practically the same figure.

Thus I repeat that the Democrats and Republicans are now at one as to the necessity of further protection against foreign sugars.

Let us hope that when the next tariff bill is framed the two parties will be in as thorough accord as they are to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. Has not this war demonstrated the fact that every country should have its own sugar industry in order to be safe?

Mr. MARTIN. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not my friend's judgment that it is time for Members to stop quarreling with the producers, not only of sugar but of all agricultural products, and to go after certain profiteers who stand between the producer and the consumer?

Mr. MARTIN. They are the ones who are doing all the profiteering.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Can the gentleman give the comparative cost of producing cane sugar and beet sugar in this country?

Mr. MARTIN. I will state to the gentleman that I have a table showing the increased cost of production, which I will print in my remarks. I did not want to take the time to read it.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I am speaking about the comparative cost of the production of cane sugar and beet sugar.

Mr. MARTIN. There is very little difference at this time.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. So they are both in the same boat.

Mr. MARTIN. Both in the same boat.

Mr. O'CONNOR. With reference to the suggestion that sugar is a sort of exotic or desert rose, will the gentleman kindly state for the information of Members how many acres are devoted to the raising of sugar down in Louisiana, the number of people dependent on the sugar industry, and the great number of thriving towns scattered all through that famous Teche country?

Mr. MARTIN. There are more than 350,000 acres of land cultivated in cane in Louisiana, and with factories and buildings represent an investment of at least $120,000,000. There are some 60,000 laborers employed at an annual outlay of more than $30,000,000.

In the beet-sugar industry there is an investment of more than $150,000,000, and some 200,000 farmers are engaged in cultivating 800,000 acres of beets.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Teche country has been truthfully described as the paradise of this earth, where the skies are bluer and the grass greener than anywhere else. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. As a matter of fact, is not practically one entire congressional district and a large part of three other congressional districts in Louisiana given over very largely, if not wholly, to the production of sugar?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; most of the third congressional district is cultivated in sugar.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. And a large part of the sixth?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. And a large part of the seventh and a good part of the first and second.

Mr. MARTIN. That is correct.

Mr. OLIVER. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the domestic crop of sugar, which he states has already been sold, has been sold to parties who are now hoarding it?

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir. As I stated in my remarks, there is no hoarding in this country at all so far as sugar is concerned. The distribution of all raw sugars is absolutely in the hands of the Government, and they designate where it shall go.

Mr. OLIVER. Has the gentleman any information as to the amount of sugar that candy manufacturers now have on hand?

Mr. MARTIN. I have not.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman know whether the amount they have on hand is more than sufficient to meet their ordinary needs for some months?

Mr. MARTIN. I think not. As I said in my remarks, the canners put off buying their sugar, believing that the Government control would stop and that the price would be reduced.

Mr. OLIVER. On yesterday, as I recall, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] stated that if there was in fact a sugar shortage it was due in a large measure to manipulations of the Sugar Trust. Is the gentleman sufficiently informed to give us in detail what those manipulations are?

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir. I agree with Gov. SANDERS that previous to the war there was considerable manipulation of sugar, but I do not believe there is any manipulation now, by reason of the fact their output is absolutely under the control of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks the various contracts to which I referred in my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the contracts referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION OF UNITED STATES SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD (INC.).

First. The name of this corporation is United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.).

Second. The location of its pricipal office in the State of Delaware is in the city of Wilmington, county of New Castle. The name of the resident agent therein and in charge thereof is the Delaware Charter Co. The street and number of said principal office, and the address by street and number of said resident agent, is 900–904 Market Street.

Third. The objects and purposes for which, and for any of which, this corporation is formed are to do any or all of the things herein set forth to the same extent as natural persons might or could do, viz, to purchase or otherwise acquire, manufacture, sell or otherwise dispose of, store, handle and otherwise deal in, and with raw and refined cane and beet sugar, sirups, molasses, and other commodities, and to do all acts and things necessary, expedient, or incidental to the efficient conduct of said business within or without the State of Delaware.

To exercise all powers which may be delegated to it by the President of the United States.

The foregoing clauses shall be construed both as objects and powers, and it is hereby expressly provided that the foregoing enumeration of specific powers shall not be held to limit or restrict in any manner the powers of this corporation.

In general, to have and to exercise all the powers conferred by the laws of Delaware upon corporations formed under the act hereinafter referred to.

Fourth. The total authorized capital stock of this corporation is $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of $100 each.

The amount of capital stock with which this corporation will commence business is the sum of $1,000, being 10 shares of $100 each.

Fifth. The names and places of residence of each of the original subscribers to the capital stock and the number of shares subscribed for by each are as follows:

Name.	Residence.	Number of shares.

AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION AS TO LOUISIANA SUGARS.

This agreement, entered into this — day of ———, 1918, between Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator, acting in this behalf for the President of the United States, and ——— ——— of ———, hereinafter called the producer, witnesseth that—

Whereas the United States Food Administrator, pursuant to the act of Congress approved August 10, 1917, known as the "food-control act," has issued regulations for the conduct of the business of all persons importing, manufacturing, storing, or distributing sugar, and desires under said act to secure an equitable distribution of the cane-sugar crop of the season of 1918–19 and to prevent unjust, unreasonable, unfair, and wasteful commissions, profits, and practices; and

Whereas the United States Food Administrator has requested all producers of cane sugar in the State of Louisiana to enter into an agreement with him covering the sale and distribution of all cane sugar produced in the State of Louisiana and manufactured for direct consumption; and

Whereas the United States Food Administrator has appointed a committee of the United States Food Administration to be called the Louisiana sugar committee, and, subject to his approval, to superintend the distribution of Louisiana sugar and carry out the provisions of this contract. A majority of said committee shall constitute a quorum, and the assent of four members of said committee at a meeting duly called shall be considered the action of the committee. The committee shall be composed of the following persons, and in the event of vacancies occurring the United States Food Administrator shall appoint successors to all such vacancies:

R. E. Milling (chairman), C. D. Kemper, E. J. Gay, J. C. LeBourgeois, W. J. Barkley, E. A. Pharr, and E. A. Burguieres.

Whereas the undersigned, ——— ———, is a producer of cane sugar and is desirous of aiding and promoting the efficient administration of said act and of securing the purpose contemplated by said act by agreement as authorized by section 2 of the aforesaid act of Congress.

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and the agreements of the United States Food Administrator hereafter set forth the producer hereby agrees:

(1) That in selling and distributing Louisiana cane sugar he will observe and respect and be governed by any and all orders and regulations which said United States Food Administrator, through the said sugar committee, may from time to time make or prescribe, or any general or special regulations issued under the provisions of said act.

(2) That the "basic price" of fine granulated sugar at any time for the purposes of this contract shall be that price which is then determined by the United States Food Administrator under the provisions of his uniform contracts with the sugar refiners of the United States dated October 1, 1917, as the maximum price which may be charged by such refiners for fine granulated in barrels or 100-pound bags f. o. b. seaboard points with the customary discounts, terms, and conditions, which contract is on file with the United States Food Administrator and made part hereof by reference, and the basic price of Louisiana sugars shall be such basic price less the following differentials:

	Per hundredweight.
Plantation granulated	None.
White clarified	$0.10
Off plantation granulated	0.10
Off white	0.15
Choice yellow clarified	0.15
Prime yellow clarified	0.20
Kettle	0.20
Off yellow clarified	0.30
Seconds and thirds (first group)	0.80
Seconds and thirds (second group)	0.90
Seconds and thirds (third group)	1.00
Seconds and thirds (fourth group)	1.10
Seconds and thirds (fifth group)	1.20

(Differential later reduced on clarifieds.)

The differential on all grades of semirefined, direct-consumption sugars not listed above shall be the differential indicated for sugars of equal grade, or, if of an intermediate grade, at the differential of the listed grade next below; and the differential on sugars the grade and price of which can not be thus determined shall be fixed by the said sugar committee.

The above grades shall be determined with reference to the standard samples thereof as fixed by the New Orleans Sugar and Rice Exchange, with the approval of the United States Food Administration, and now on file with said exchange. In case of dispute regarding the grade, the final decision shall be made by the Louisiana Sugar Committee.

(3) That unless the aforesaid Louisiana Sugar Committee permits the sale at a lower price by reason of deterioration, or sets a lower price for any or all grades under the provisions of section 4 hereof, the producer will sell direct consumption sugars manufactured by him at not more than such price as is found to be just and fair by the United States Food Administrator, hereafter called the "maximum price." The said United States Food Administrator agrees that he will not name a price less than the basic price mentioned in section 2 hereof for sugar in barrels or 100-pound bags f. o. b. New Orleans or point of origin carrying the same freight rate as New Orleans. Provided, however, That if domestic beet sugar is generally selling at a higher price than the basic price of fine cane granulated sugar, the United States Food Administrator will not name a price less than the price of domestic beet sugar less the differentials named in paragraph 2, provided that if there is a sale to the United States or any of its agencies such price shall not necessarily govern.

That he will sell raw sugar at a price delivered at customary Louisiana refining points not greater than the price which may be found to be just and fair by the United States Food Administrator and not less than the price of duty paid 96° Cuban raw sugar delivered at such refining points.

That he will sell washed sugar (which is defined as any first sugar above the grade of raw sugar, and below the grade of off yellow clarified, and having a color test of not less than 22 Dutch standard) at a price 40 cents above the price of raw sugar as determined by the foregoing paragraph and paragraph 4, with an addition of one-sixteenth of a cent per pound for each degree or fraction thereof above 96°, and a deduction of one-tenth of a cent per pound for each degree or fraction thereof below 96°.

(4) The producer further agrees that the said sugar committee with the approval of the United States Food Administrator may name a price for any grade or grades of Louisiana sugar from time to time at any figure not greater than the price for such grade or grades which may be fixed as the "maximum price" therefor by the United States Food Administration under paragraph 3 hereof, and that after the prices thus fixed are posted at the New Orleans Sugar and Rice Exchange he will sell the sugar at the price named until changed under the provisions of this contract.

(5) In the event that the producer is required by the United States Food Administrator directly or through said committee to ship sugar to a point carrying a freight rate higher from point of origin to point of destination than that from New Orleans to point of destination the producer may add to the price prescribed under paragraphs 3 and 4 hereof the extra freight, provided that the selling price to the retailer shall not be greater than the maximum authorized selling price of similar sugars at such point to retailers.

(6) a. The producer further agrees that he will ship sugar at such time, to such places, and in such quantities as may be directed by the United States Food Administrator through the said sugar committee; that he will route all sugars as directed by said committee; and that he will promptly comply with all orders for change of destination and route and for reconsignment.

Provided, That if no instructions or directions are given by the said Food Administrator or the sugar committee he may continue to distribute his sugar in the customary manner heretofore existing for the distribution of such sugars, subject to the price provisions of this contract.

Provided further, That nothing in this contract shall require the producer to ship or dispose of his sugar when prices lower than the "maximum price" named under paragraph 3, less the differentials stated in paragraph 2, are named by the sugar committee under paragraph 4.

b. The producer, unless notified to the contrary, will keep the committee constantly informed of the quantity and grade of sugar that is being produced daily and the disposition of the same.

(7) In consideration of the foregoing agreement, the United States Food Administrator agrees:

a. That he will cause the said sugar committee to direct the disposition of direct consumption sugars in the most economical and efficient method consistent with equitable distribution and the needs of the country.

b. That he will use his best efforts to secure preference in the distribution and sale to local refiners of Louisiana raw sugars manufactured by the producer herein, if the producer is desirous of selling to such refiners.

c. That he will use his best efforts with the proper authorities to secure an adequate supply of railroad cars for the distribution of all Louisiana sugars covered by this contract.

(8) Sugar shall be delivered to the United States Government for Army and Navy uses when and in such amount as the Government may require at prices to be fixed by the United States Food Administrator.

(9) It is understood and agreed by the producer that a willful violation of any of the terms of this agreement may result in and be cause for revocation of his license.

(10) This agreement shall remain in full force and effect from October 1, 1918, and until the final disposition of the crop of the season 1918–19, and for each succeeding year thereafter until the existing state of war between the United States Government and Germany shall have terminated and the fact of such termination shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States; provided, that either party hereto may withdraw from the contract after the disposition of the crop of 1918–19 by giving a 30 days' written notice to that effect before October 1, 1919; or may withdraw for any subsequent crop year by giving such notice on or before October 1 of that year.

(11) The word "he" wherever used in this contract to indicate the producer shall refer to such producer, whether an individual, partnership, or corporation, as the case may be.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have subscribed this agreement on the day and year first above written.

CONTRACT COVERING PURCHASE OF FULL CUBAN CROP BY SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD FINALLY RATIFIED.

TEXT OF AGREEMENT.

Agreement entered into this 24th day of October, 1918, in the city and State of New York by and between United States Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation of the State of Delaware, a party of the first part; Carlos Manuel de Cespedes, Robert B. Hawley, and Manuel Rionda, a Cuban commission, parties of the second part; and agents of various Cuban producers acting severally for the producers of sugar in the island of Cuba, parties of the third part, witnesseth:

Whereas the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), was created and is acting as an agency of the United States for the purpose in part of equalizing the distribution and selling price of sugar, and to that end has power and authority to purchase domestic or foreign raw sugar in such quantities, at such prices, and upon such terms and conditions as it may deem advisable, and to resell said sugar in its discretion at, below or above cost, and upon the same or other and additional terms and conditions; and

Whereas the President of the Republic of Cuba, by Executive order, has appointed Carlos Manuel de Cespedes, Robert B. Hawley, and Manuel Rionda a Cuban commission to arrange for the sale of sugar produced in the island of Cuba during the crop season 1918–19, and to pledge the Republic of Cuba to the terms and conditions provided herein to be performed by said Republic; and

Whereas the said Cuban commission has represented there is power and purpose in the Government of the Republic of Cuba to cooperate in the establishment of a stabilized price for the whole of the Cuban crop 1918–19, and also to control by license the export of any Cuban sugar to any person, entity, or country under specified terms and conditions, including price; and

Whereas the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) and the said Cuban commission have arranged for the purchase and sale of sugar produced in the island of Cuba during the crop season 1918–19, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter stated:

WHOLE OUTPUT PURCHASED.

Now, therefore, the parties hereto each for its or himself for the part to be performed by it or him, or in behalf of others herein described, agree as follows:

I.

The said Cuban commission agrees that it will immediately arrange that each and every producer of sugar in Cuba shall duly authorize an agent in the city of New York, one of the parties hereto (hereinafter severally or collectively called the seller), to contract for and sell to the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) (hereafter called the buyer) the whole of his or their output of sugar deliverable at the option and upon the direction of the buyer for shipment to the United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, or Italy, or to any other country upon the terms and conditions hereinafter stated; said authorization shall be in writing and filed with the buyer, and shall state the name and location of the factory or factories of each of the said producers and the estimated production of each during the crop season 1918–19.

II.

Pursuant to the said authorization the seller, on behalf of himself and his principals, agrees to sell and to deliver to the buyer all the raw sugar produced by him or his principals in the island of Cuba during the crop season of 1918–1919 (except that actually used for local consumption in Cuba) and the buyer agrees to purchase and receive the same on the following terms:

SHIPMENTS TO UNITED STATES.

For shipments to the United States at the price of 5.88 cents per pound c. and f. to New York-Philadelphia, basis 96° average outturn polarization, net landed weights, based on a freight rate of 38½ cents per 100 pounds from north side ports west of and including Caibarien, subject to United States raw sugar contract terms, a copy of which is hereto annexed marked "Schedule A" and made a part hereof;

For shipment to the United Kingdom, France, and Italy at the price of 5.50 cents per pound f. o. b northern ports, or 5.45 cents per pound f. o. b. south side ports, basis for 96° centrifugal sugar, subject to all the conditions of the usual contract form for shipments to these countries, a copy of which is hereby annexed marked "Schedule B" and made a part hereof;

For shipment to Canada, if shipped direct to a Canadian port, at the same prices and upon the same terms as are provided for shipments to the United Kingdom, but if shipped via New York at the same prices and upon the same terms as are provided for shipments to the United States.

SHIPMENTS TO OTHER COUNTRIES.

For shipments to all countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, France, and Italy, at the same prices and upon the same terms as are provided for shipments to the United Kingdom, except, however, that net shipping weights, less 1 per cent, and Cuban tests shall be accepted by the buyer and the seller (weight to be calculated on United States standard), and that payment for such sugar shall be made by the buyer in cash in New York in 10 days after presentation of shipping documents, or, at seller's option, by 10 days' sight draft drawn on buyer with shipping documents attached, and except that all matters of disagreement shall be determined pursuant to the provisions of article 6 hereof.

The freight rates from various Cuban ports to various United States ports and the minimum amount of sugar to be loaded per day at each Cuban port are and will be as set forth in Schedule C annexed hereto and made a part hereof, except as the same may be hereafter changed by the United States Shipping Board or other agency of the United States Government having jurisdiction in the premises.

Shipments are to be made as soon as possible after grinding commences, and not less than 2 per cent of the amount shall be shipped during December, 1918, the balance in approximate equal monthly shipments from January to November, 1919, both inclusive.

Sugar shall be shipped in sound jute bags containing approximately 325 pounds each. In all cases where shipment is made in second-hand bags there shall be deducted not less than 15 cents for each second-hand bag.

The buyer will notify the seller from time to time of proposed allocations of sugar for shipment as between the United States and other countries, and shipments shall be made as directed.

The seller undertakes to pay all lighterage charges and all shipping expenses and also all Cuban taxes, both domestic and export.

The seller also undertakes to pay all necessary expenses at the port of discharge to effect delivery to buyer on such safe wharf or refinery dock as may be designated by buyer.

The seller agrees to pay to the buyer a commission of one-half of 1 per cent on the sugar allocated for shipment to countries other than the United States and Canada.

SELLER TO PAY BROKERAGE.

The seller agrees to pay on the sugar allocated for shipment to the United States and Canada a brokerage to be calculated on the average tons of Cuban sugar handled by brokers in the United States heretofore acting in their legitimate capacity as brokers in the three-year period of 1915, 1916, and 1917, but the total disbursement for this purpose shall not exceed $350,000. The concurrent decision of the buyer and the Cuban commission shall be final and conclusive on any question or dispute arising under this clause.

In the event of any steamer being lost its cargo shall be settled on the bill of lading net weights and Cuban tests as soon as possible, but not later than 30 days after proof of loss.

The parties obligated thereto will use due diligence and every effort to provide tonnage, but are released from responsibility by acts or circumstances beyond their control.

Marine insurance to be covered by the buyer from shore to shore including the risk of lighterage to and from the vessel at ports of loading and discharge. Sugar shall not be loaded on any steamers or other vessels not acceptable to the insurers under buyers' average rate policy, unless specific directions to load an unacceptable vessel are given by either the buyer or the seller. When such specific directions are given the excess insurance over an average rate of 31 cents per $100 shall be paid by the party ordering the vessel loaded. All war risk is for account of buyer.

III.

The buyer shall have the right from time to time to assign this contract, without recourse, in respect to any part of the sugar contracted for herein, to the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, France, or Italy, or to any duly constituted agency representing all or either of said Governments, or to any sugar refiner of the United States. The buyer, upon making any such assignment, shall give notice thereof to the seller.

IV.

The purchase of the sugar crop of 1918–19 by the buyer, as herein provided, is made in reliance upon the representation and agreement of the Cuban Government that it will effectually prohibit any sugars of the 1918–19 crop from being shipped or exported from the Island of Cuba except under this contract, and that it will enact such laws and promulgate such orders and decrees as are necessary to faithfully fulfill and observe the stipulation and condition aforesaid.

In the event of failure on the part of the Cuban Government to take the action above provided, or to faithfully fulfill and observe said stipulation and condition, or in the event of inoperation, rescission, or suspension thereof, the buyer shall have the option, upon notice in writing to the seller, to cancel this contract in respect to any undelivered portion of the said sugar crop of 1918–19.

If the seller fails to deliver the sugar required to be delivered to the buyer under this contract or if any sugar is directly or indirectly shipped or exported from the Island of Cuba by the seller or his principal to any consignee other than the buyer or its assigns, the buyer shall have the right, either in law or in equity, to sue for and recover all damages resulting therefrom, whether or not the above option of cancellation is exercised.

V.

This contract is also made in reliance upon the representation and agreement of the Cuban Government that it will place no restrictions or embargoes on the export of molasses to the United States.

VI.

All matters of disagreement arising under this contract between the buyer and the seller which can not be adjusted by them to their mutual satisfaction, shall be left to arbitration in Washington. But before any arbitration can be called by the seller the matter in dispute shall be submitted by it or him to the Cuban Commission, and its approval of and consent to the arbitration obtained in writing. For the purposes of the arbitration the buyer and the seller shall each select one arbitrator, and the two so selected shall select a third, and the decision of any two of said arbitrators shall be final and conclusive upon the parties thereto. Any expenses attached to such arbitration shall be divided equally between said parties. It is agreed, however, that as to disputes arising on shipments to the United Kingdom, France, or Italy the arbitration clause in Schedule B shall apply.

VII.

The Cuban commission is acting hereunder solely in a representative capacity as an administrative agency of the Cuban Government under the express authority of said Government, and its members do not assume nor shall they be charged with any personal liability. Upon the execution of this contract the Cuban Government will promptly take such governmental action as is necessary on its part to carry out its terms. It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that the obligations of the buyer hereunder are conditioned upon the undertakings of the Cuban Government herein expressed and upon the faithful fulfillment and observance thereof.

VIII.

It is contemplated by the buyer and seller that the greater part of the sugar delivered for shipment to the United States will be resold, directly or indirectly, to the Atlantic and Gulf sugar refiners of the United States, who will be made the consignee of such sugar. For the convenience of the parties in all such cases it is agreed that before departure of vessel from loading port the seller, upon request of the buyer, will execute with the consignee a confirmation in the form of Schedule A hereto annexed, and will settle with such consignee in accordance with this contract, and it is further agreed that the buyer will guarantee performance by the consignee. All such consignments shall be by negotiable bill of lading.

IX.

It is agreed that the seller or his principals shall not export from the island of Cuba during the terms of this contract any edible sirups fit for human consumption from which sugar may be commercially extracted without the consent of the buyer.

X.

Should any unforeseen circumstances such as war, rebellion, insurrection, political disturbances, strikes, lack of fuel, riots, or civil disturbances in the island of Cuba prevent the making of the sugar covered by this contract, the seller shall so advise the buyer immediately and thereupon shall be released from delivery of such portion of the crop as can not be made or delivered, but the seller agrees to use due diligence to carry out this contract in its entirety, notwithstanding the circumstances mentioned.

Should any unforeseen circumstances such as war, fire, explosion, acts of God and the public enemy, strikes, riots, car shortage, lack of fuel, or disturbances in the United States prevent the buyer from receiving or delivering, or the refiners of the United States from refining the sugar purchased under this contract the buyer shall immediately give notice of such conditions to the seller and thereupon the buyer shall be released from any damages by reason of nonacceptance of raw sugar (except sugars afloat) during the time that the above conditions continue, but the buyer will use all due diligence, notwithstanding the unforeseen circumstances, to carry out this contract as far as possible in its entirety.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto being duly authorized, have executed this agreement as of the day and year first above written.

CUBAN COMMISSION,
By ——— ———,
Agents of various Cuban producers acting severally for the producers of sugar in the island of Cuba under authorizations dated October 24, 1918, and filed with the buyer.

RAW SUGAR CONTRACT—SCHEDULE A—CONFIRMATION—UNITED STATES RAW SUGAR CONTRACT—CUBAS—COST AND FREIGHT.

NEW YORK, ———, 191–.

To ——— ——— Refining Co. (hereinafter called consignee).

At the request of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) we hereby confirm the sale to you for its account under the terms of the agreement as to Cuban sugars, 1918–19 crop, dated October 24, 1918, of about —— long tons of Cuba centrifugal sugar. Delivery of 5 per cent, more or less than this amount, to be settled for on same basis. Shipment to be made by negotiable bill of lading per s/s ——— expected to be loaded at ——— about ——, 191–, for port of ——— via steamer (or steamers) or by car ferry via Key West. The consignee must give notice of destination at least two days before steamer finishes loading at the last loading port. The consignee can order steamers to New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Savannah, New Orleans, or Galveston, but to only one port for each trip.

At a price of 5.88 cents a pound, cost and freight, basis 96 degree average outturn polarization, net landed weights, and is based on a freight rate of 38½ cents from north side ports west of and including Caibarien to New York or/and Philadelphia. In case the rate of freight to Boston, Savannah, New Orleans, or Galveston is lower/higher than the rate to New York or/and Philadelphia from said north side ports, the amount of the reduction/increase shall be deducted from/added to the above price. In case the rate of freight from said north side ports to new York or/and Philadelphia is increased/decreased, the above price shall be increased/decreased by the amount of such increase/decrease.

Discharge of the sugar in the United States to be made at a customary safe wharf or refinery, as directed by the consignee. Demurrage and dispatch money at port of destination to be for account of consignee and at port of loading to be for account of seller. Consignee not to be responsible for demurrage or other loss caused by reason of the failure of seller to furnish all necessary Cuban papers. Documents required to effect a prompt entry and discharge of cargo in the United States to be furnished by the seller. Party in default in producing necessary papers for entry of sugar shall be liable for demurrage of the vessel and for actual expense incurred.

TERMS OF PAYMENT.

Payment by the consignee to ——— ——— either in cash on presentation of all necessary shipping documents or at buyer's option by one-day sight draft attached to the shipping documents for 95 per cent of the invoice, based on net shipping weights and tests less interest for nine days at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. Any balance to be paid after final settlement of weights and tests, with interest on balance at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from 10 days after date of entry of steamer. If sugar is shipped in sailing vessel, payment to be made in cash on presentation of documents after entry of vessel at customhouse for 95 per cent of the invoice, based on net shipping weights and tests with interest on said balance as above. All payments to be made in New York or New York exchange.

Samples to be drawn mutually by consignee and seller. Three tests to be made of each sample of sugar—one by seller's public chemist, one by consignee's public chemist, and one by the New York Sugar Trade Laboratory. The average of the two nearest polarizations to be taken as the final test. Settlement on each shipment to be made on the final test, with the allowance of one-twentieth of 1 cent per pound for each degree above the selling basis up to 98 degrees and one-tenth of 1 cent per pound for each degree below the selling basis down to 94 degrees, fractions in proportion. Any marks below 94-degree test three-twentieths of 1 cent per pound per degree down, fractions in proportion, but no sugar to be delivered below 93 degrees, unless on discount terms mutually satisfactory to consignee and seller.

Marine and war-risk insurance arranged by the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.).

SCHEDULE B.

CONDITIONS OF THE USUAL CONTRACT FORM FOR SHIPMENT TO THE UNITED KINGDOM, FRANCE, AND ITALY.

——— tons (of 2,240 lbs. net each) of Cuba, centrifugal sugar, fair average quality of the crop.

For shipment ——— ——— free on board steamers at one or two customary ——— safe north side Cuban ports for each cargo.

Basis 96 per cent average outturn polarization. For any excess above 96 per cent one-twentieth of 1 cent per pound per degree to be added to contract price; for any deficiency below 96 per cent, one-tenth of 1 cent per pound per degree to be deducted from contract price down to 94 per cent polarization. If any mark or marks polarize below 94 per cent, an allowance of three-twentieths of 1 cent per pound per degree to be deducted in addition to the aforesaid allowance from 96 per cent to 94 per cent, but no sugar to be delivered below 93 per cent.

FRACTIONS IN ALL CASES IN PROPORTION.

Net landed weights and outturn polarization at ports of discharge in United Kingdom, but at ports in France and Italy net shipping weights less 1 per cent and Cuban tests to govern. Shipping weights to be calculated on United States standard.

USUAL CONDITIONS OF SAMPLING AND POLARIZING.

Sellers have the option of delivering at one or two customary safe south side Cuban ports. Vessels are to receive sugar as fast as possible, and the sellers are to supply the cargoes at not less than 6,000 bags per working day at north side ports and Cienfuegos, and 4,500 bags per day at all other south side ports, in default of which demurrage is to be paid by sellers at the same rate as heretofore.

Sugar is to be shipped in vessels to be provided by buyers to load as above. Buyers to give sellers reasonable notice of expected readiness.

Payment to be made by buyers in cash in New York in exchange for complete sets of bills of lading and certificates of origin (old and new forms) immediately upon receipt of cable from ——— to ——— saying that the documents are in their possession in New York.

Marine insurance from shore to shore, including craft risk loading and discharging, on usual full Lloyd's conditions to be for buyer's account.

WAR RISK, IF ANY, TO BE FOR BUYER'S ACCOUNT.

Any dispute arising out of this contract to be settled by arbitration under the rules of the Sugar Association of London (cane-sugar section), buyers being considered as a refiner.

If sugar shipped to Europe, buyers to give sellers at once copies of such documents as are required by and on forms acceptable to the customs at port of destination, including full details of such consular certificates as are needful. Sellers to have shipping documents made on similar forms as soon as shipment is complete, but they are not to be held responsible for any delays owing to absence of or distant locations of consuls from port of shipment.

In the event of buyers failing to provide tonnage as above they are to reimburse sellers for the actual cost and proved loss of holding over the sugar, including interest at 5 per cent per annum. The provisions of tonnage not to be unduly delayed.

REFINERS' AGREEMENT.

Agreement entered into this 24th day of October, 1918, in the city and State of New York, between the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a corporation of the State of Delaware, hereinafter described as the "Equalization Board," and the refiners of sugar in the United States, acting severally, signatory hereto, hereinafter described as the "refiners," and Herbert Hoover, as United States Food Administrator, hereinafter described as the "Food Administrator," witnesseth:

Whereas the Equalization Board has been created and is acting as an agency of the United States for the purpose in part of equalizing the distribution and selling price of sugar, and contemporaneously with the execution of this agreement has entered into an agreement bearing even date herewith for the purchase of raw sugar produced in the island of Cuba during the crop season 1918–19, which agreement, described as the "Cuban agreement," is hereto annexed and marked "Exhibit A"; and

Whereas, with a view to securing regular and sufficient supplies of sugar to the American people and the Army and Navy at a reasonable price, even during the disorganized period of world trade, the Equalization Board has, in the interest of the American people and the Allies, purchased the Cuban crop of 1918–19 for distribution to the American people, their Allies, and others; and

Whereas the Food Administrator and the Equalization Board are desirous of securing an equality of distribution of said sugars according to requirements or to secure such exports from said sugar as may be in surplus and may be determined by the agencies of the Government as necessary to meet its international obligations; and

Whereas it is necessary and advisable, in order to secure an equitable distribution of sugar throughout the United States, to apportion Cuban and other sugars among the refiners for their requirements, and to that end to continue the American refiners' committee; and

Whereas the American refiners are desirous of fully cooperating with the agencies of the Government in the purposes above set forth:

Now, therefore, the parties hereto, in consideration of the premises and the mutual covenants herein contained, each for itself and himself, for the part or proportion of this agreement to be performed by it or him, severally and not jointly, agree as follows:

1. The Food Administrator and said refiners agree that the agreement of October 1, 1917, between the refiners and the Food Administrator shall be, and same is hereby, canceled and annuled so far as the rights and obligations of the parties hereto to each other are concerned, except as to such sugars of 1917–18 crop as have not been delivered.

2. Such of the following-named persons as are officers of companies signatory hereto are hereby appointed by the Food Administrator for the period of this agreement and shall constitute the American refiners' committee, with the powers and duties hereinafter set forth: James H. Post (chairman), Claus A. Spreckels, Charles M. Warner, George H. Earle, jr., Robert M. Parker; and the following-named persons who are representatives of companies signatory hereto are appointed as alternates on said committee, who shall have the privilege of being present at all meetings and serving in place of any absent member or filling any vacancies in said committee in the order named: Dwight P. Thomas, W. J. McCahan, jr., Benjamin A. Oxnard, M. E. Goetzinger, John Farr, William Henderson, W. T. Eldredge, E. L. Wemple.

3. Until the 31st day of December, 1919, the refiners will not purchase any sugar except from the Equalization Board, other than such sugars as are provided under the said agreement of October 1, 1917, and Hawaiian sugars hereinafter referred to: Provided, however, That refiners may purchase sugars other than the crop of 1918–19, for delivery after December 31, 1919.

4. The sugar provided by the Equalization Board shall be distributed among the refiners who enter into this agreement to meet their requirements in the proportions set forth in "Exhibit B," which is made a part hereof, and in case there is a disagreement between a refiner and the American Refiners' committee as to apportionment the matter shall be submitted to the United States Food Administrator and his decision shall be final, and any sugar received by a refiner from any source shall be charged against his pro rata amount under such distribution. The Hawaiian sugar that may be deliverable under any contract to any refiner, party hereto, shall be taken over in rotation in an order to be determined by lot, to be drawn by the chairman of the American Refiners' committee and upon the terms provided for in such contract for account of the New York and Philadelphia refiners, parties hereto, and the rights and obligations of the purchaser under said contract are to be assumed by said refiners.

5. The American Refiners' committee is, under the direction, supervision, and control of the Equalization Board, hereby charged with the duty and responsibility on behalf of the refiners hereto, of arranging, routing, and distributing to the several refiners the sugar to be purchased as hereinafter set forth from the Equalization Board, and such duties shall, so far as possible, be carried out in accordance with the requirements and conveniences of the several refiners.

6. The several refiners, not in any way limiting their ordinary power or business discretion to determine to what extent they may severally operate their refineries, agree to and do hereby purchase from the Equalization Board, and the Equalization Board agree, subject to its committments from time to time to Governments or persons outside the United States and to the requirements of the United States Government, and buyers in the United States other than refiners, to sell to the refiners their entire requirements of raw sugar for the operation of their several refineries for such time as the respective refiners in their respective judgments determine to operate their respective refineries, for the period beginning with the date of this agreement and ending on December 31, 1919 (except for such raw sugars as are purchased by the refiners under the agreement of October 1, 1917, and the Hawaiian contracts herein referred to); and they severally agree not to purchase any sugar from any person, country, or source of supply during said period other than from the Equalization Board.

For all such purchases of sugar from Cuba the several refiners agree to pay the price of 7.28 cents per pound, 96° average outturn polarization (duty, if any, paid). (For sugar polarizing over 96° there shall be added to the price 7 cents per 100 pounds per degree up to 98°. For sugar polarizing under 96° there shall be deducted from the price 12 cents per 100 pounds per degree down to 94°. For sugar polarizing between 94° down to 93° there shall be deducted from the price 17 cents per 100 pounds per degree, fractions in proportion.)

All sugar furnished the refiners from Cuba shall be settled for by each refiner on the same terms and conditions under which said sugar was purchased by the Equalization Board under the Cuban agreement. The refiners severally agree for their proportions of the Cuban sugar hereby purchased by them to pay the amounts required to be paid by the Equalization Board, under, by, and in accordance with the terms of the Cuban agreement and in addition thereto to pay the Equalization Board the difference between the amount per pound they are required to pay under the Cuban agreement for sugar delivered and 7.28 cents per pound for 96° test.

The Equalization Board states that the amount so paid to it may be used by it for the liquidation of any losses it may incur on excess stocks of sugar purchased by it or in equalizing the distribution or price of sugar to the American people. Any balance in the treasury of the Equalization Board, after the discharge of its obligations hereunder, and other liabilities, belongs to its only stockholder, the United States.

7. The refiners severally agree to receive, accept, and pay for any sugar other than Cuba which may be purchased by the Equalization Board from time to time for the requirements of such refiners, respectively, as stated in paragraph VI, at a price of 7.28 cents per pound, 96 degree test, average outturn polarization (duty, if any, paid) delivered at the refinery, with allowances for differences in test, as specified in paragraph VI, provided that the Sugar Equalization Board is not required to deliver sugar under this and the preceding paragraph VI unless due notice of the requirements of such refiner is given to the said board and the sugars are reasonably obtainable at a delivered duty-paid price of 7.28 cents per pound or less.

8. Marine insurance on sugar purchased by the Equalization Board on a cost and freight basis shall be arranged by the American Refiners' Committee, under direction of the Equalization Board, from shore to shore, including the risk of lighterage to and from the vessel at ports of loading and discharge, the cost thereof to be paid by the refiners severally and charged against the price of the sugar delivered hereunder.

9. The Equalization Board, however, reserves the right in its sole discretion, from time to time, to change the price to the refiners as to any sugar to be delivered under this agreement upon giving 15 days previous notice of such change of price, and in case of any such change in price settlement by the refiners for their purchases of all sugar shall thereafter be upon the basis of such changed price instead of the 7.28 cents per pound 96 degree test above mentioned. Due regard to be given allowances up and down from 96 degrees.

10. In making settlement for sugars purchased by them hereunder, the Colonial Sugar Co. and the Leon Godchaux Co. (Ltd.) shall each be entitled to charge against any sum or sums to be severally paid by them, to cover inland freight to refining points when paid by such refiners, the sum of 3½ cents per 100 pounds of sugar purchased by them from the Sugar Equalization Board aforesaid. These charges, however, may be canceled or changed from time to time at the option of the Equalization Board.

11. Each of the undersigned refiners agrees that it will sell all sugar refined by it at a price not more than $1.54 net per 100 pounds wholesale of refined sugar, on the basis of fine granulated sugar in barrels or in 100-pound bags, when used as the standard basis, f. o. b. refinery above the price for 96-degree centrifugal sugar paid to the Equalization Board provided for in this agreement, with such differentials as are now shown on its official price list, same being subject to change from time to time on consent and approval of the Equalization Board. Said net margin shall be exclusive of the 2 per cent cash discount, payment in 10 days to the trade. This margin is determined on a delivered duty paid price of from 7.10 to 7.35 cents per pound for 96-degree test raw sugar, and in case the price provided for in this agreement goes below 7.10 cents per pound the margin aforesaid shall be decreased in such a manner as to return substantially the same profit to the refiner. In case the basic price goes above 7.35 cents per pound, said margin shall be increased to accomplish the same purpose. It is mutually agreed between the parties hereto the said margin shall be promptly revised by the parties hereto from time to time in case of changes in cost of refining and of wholesale distribution, or in the event of an excise or similar tax.

It is further understood that the margin upon any sugar purchased under the Hawaiian contracts above referred to may be increased by the amount of the differential under which sugar is purchased.

12. It is further understood that inasmuch as this agreement has been entered into at the request of the Food Administration and the Equalization Board for the purposes above recited, in view of the limitation on the price to be secured by the refiner for its refined product, it is mutually agreed between the Equalization Board and the refiners that in case of an advance or decline in the price of sugar from 7.28 cents per pound for 96° test, raw basis, due to any action of the Equalization Board, the Equalization Board will pay to each of the refiners in the event of a decline in price, and each of the refiners will pay to the Equalization Board in the event of a raise in price, a sum equivalent to the change in price multiplied by the number of pounds of raw or refined sugar, raw basis (refined sugar shall be reduced to raw basis by adding 7 per cent to its weight), which each of the refiners may have purchased hereunder and which is undelivered or on hand or in transit on the date when such change takes place.

13. Each refiner signatory hereto agrees to conduct his or its export business under the direction of the Equalization Board and to export or distribute to the domestic trade such proportion of its refined sugar as the Equalization Board may direct, upon prices and terms which will yield the refiner the same margin as is specified in paragraph XI, and in the event of sales for export at a higher price the excess over the refiners' margin is to be for the account of the Equalization Board.

The Equalization Board furthermore agrees, in conducting its export business, that it will endeavor, where conditions permit, to provide (in case the refiners desire) additional quantities of dutiable raw sugar after giving due consideration to the requests and requirements of other nations or buyers.

14. So long as raw sugars are available for refiners' requirements the said Food Administrator and the said Equalization Board will not restrict the sale and distribution of refined sugar made from raw sugar purchased under this agreement. The Food Administrator or the Equalization Board shall have the right to supervise the domestic distribution of sugar during the life of this contract. No restrictions shall be placed upon domestic consumption until after the refiners have been consulted.

15. In the event that any refiner named in Exhibit B does not enter into this agreement its pro rata proportion of sugar shall be allotted to the refiners signatory hereto, if they desire, in the proportion and at the price and upon the terms and conditions herein provided as to the sugar purchased hereunder.

16. From October 1, 1919, to December 31, 1919, if requested so to do by the Equalization Board, the refiners agree to refine any raw sugar the Equalization Board may have purchased and not sold to the refiners at the refiners' margin then in effect, to be ascertained as provided in paragraph XI, less 3 cents per 100 pounds. The refiners agree to offer said sugar for sale and distribution, if requested so to do, at such price and on such terms as the Equalization Board may direct for a commission of 3 cents per 100 pounds.

17. Should any unforeseen circumstances, such as war, rebellion, insurrection, political disturbances, strikes, lack of fuel, marine loss, fire, explosion, riots or civil disturbances, embargoes, prohibitions, or other causes, either in the United States, Cuba, or elsewhere, prevent the Equalization Board from making delivery of the sugar according to the terms hereof, it shall so advise the refiners' committee immediately and be released from delivery of such portion of the sugar as can not be delivered, but the Equalization Board agrees to use due diligence to carry out this agreement in its entirety, notwithstanding the circumstances mentioned.

18. All matters of disagreement arising under this agreement between the Equalization Board and any other party hereto which can not be adjusted by them to their mutual satisfaction shall be left to arbitration in Washington. The Equalization Board and the American refiners' committee shall each select one arbitrator and the two so selected shall select a third and the decision of any two of said arbitrators shall be final and conclusive upon the parties thereto. In case the disagreement is between only one refiner and the Equalization Board the arbitrator provided to be appointed by the American refiners' committee shall be appointed by such one refiner. Any expense attached to such arbitration shall be divided equally among the parties to the arbitration.

19. It is agreed by all parties hereto that said Equalization Board may earn a profit on any sugar it may purchase and resell to said refiners or on any sugar it may purchase from said refiners and resell for export.

20. It is further understood that the individual members of the said American refiners' committee are acting herein as volunteers, in a purely administrative capacity, and accordingly the parties hereto agree that said members of the said committee shall not incur any personal liability, individually or collectively, under the terms of this contract, nor be responsible for any damage of whatever kind connected with any matter or thing relating to this contract; nor shall they be responsible or liable for any act, fault, or misconduct of any agents or persons employed by them, and the parties hereto hereby further release and discharge the same individual members of the said committee from any and all claims of whatever kind for personal responsibility or liability as aforesaid.

21. The refiners severally agree to pay their pro rata share on the basis of sugar purchased of any expenses incurred by the American refiners' committee in carrying out this agreement.

22. This agreement shall remain in full force and effect up to and including December 31, 1919, and shall cover all sugar shipped or in transit prior to that date.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REBER].

Mr. REBER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will pardon me for transgressing upon its valuable time, but I feel it my duty to make suggestions at this time that to me seem very timely and important.

The President of the United States, in his address to the Congress August 8, touched upon the subject I have in mind, but disappointed my expectations in that he did not go far enough, did not dwell fully, and did not give the subject I have in mind the prominence it deserved.

He placed this subject near the end of his address, whereas he should have put it at the beginning.

He said—I quote in part only:

> The world must pay for the appalling destruction wrought by the Great War, and we are part of the world. We must pay our share. For five years now the industry of all Europe has been slack and disordered. The normal crops have not been produced; the normal quantity of manufactured goods has not been turned out. For the present it is manifest we must quicken, not slacken, our own production.
> All will address themselves to the task of peace with the same devotion and the same stalwart preference for what is right that they displayed to the admiration of the whole world in the midst of war.

For a period of over four years the mad world has danced a mad dance, and now it must pay the fiddler. During that time the world took an immense number—possibly 100,000,000 people—out of the productive industries and put them into war, the most destructive occupation known to man. And a large number of these people have not been returned into the productive industries.

Every means of destruction that the genius of man knew or could devise was brought into play, and the destruction of life, health, and wealth was indeed appalling.

Yesterday the Hon. David Lloyd-George, the British prime minister, stated to the House of Commons that the late war cost Great Britain alone $200,000,000,000. If his figures for Great Britain are correct, what must have been the cost to the entire world? Who can estimate it correctly? Continuing, he said:

> In every direction we are spending more and are earning less. We are consuming more and producing less. These are facts. It can not last.

The premier declared that Great Britain would never improve economic matters until there came an increase in production.

> The world is suffering from shell shock on a big scale, but all of this will pass away.

One of the arguments in favor of reducing the working hours, the premier said, was that the reduction in time would not involve a reduction in output. There has, he said, been a substantial reduction in the hours of labor and the output has been reduced almost in the same mathematical proportion. Labor has made tremendous gains in the last two or three years, the premier added, but he said these could not be maintained if production did not increase.

The lives that were sacrificed we can not restore, but the wealth that we destroyed can be replaced by toil and saving, but by toil and saving only. We can create new wealth to take the place of what we destroyed, but it will require many years of hard, steady work. We must produce more than we consume. [Applause.]

We have danced and danced, and this is the price we must pay the fiddler. The enormous loss of wealth can not be replaced overnight, nor can it be restored by legislation. It is futile to attempt it. Many panaceas will be suggested, many nostrums may be tried, but they will not avail. They are simply subterfuges to side-step the natural consequences of war—to avoid paying the fiddler. Legislation can not substitute for labor and economy. It never has and never will. If the newspapers are giving us the correct news, and I presume they are, we see therein that in nearly all countries men are frantically appealing to their legislative bodies for laws to relieve the universal distress and unrest.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REBER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware, doubtless, that there have been various efforts to regulate prices from the time of the Roman Empire down. Does the gentleman know of any time when any distinguished success was made in the process?

Mr. REBER. Never any very great success.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REBER. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. It would not be a bad idea if we would try to do something, would it? There is no need to say, "Here is the wolf, and we can not do anything." We can try, can we not?

Mr. REBER. I shall cover that a little later.

They are appealing in vain, for legislation can no more restore the wealth that was destroyed than it can restore the lives that were sacrificed to the greed of men. That wealth is gone forever. New wealth can be created, but it can be created in only two ways, either by decreased consumption or increased production, or both; it is up to mankind to decide which it will be—decreased consumption or increased production, and possibly both. Lloyd-George said it meant both for England.

A condition plainly stares the world in the face. It is this: We must either get along without the wealth we formerly had, and which we destroyed ruthlessly, or we must get down to hard work and create new wealth to take its place. [Applause.]

We can not increase production by shortening working hours, by strikes, and by lockouts; nor will these methods reduce the cost of living. They will increase the cost of living by shutting off production, making a shortage of the product, thus making it scarce, and thereby increasing its cost and its selling price. Work and save should be our slogan until we regain the material conditions we formerly enjoyed. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said in his able and instructive address on the high cost of living that all of Paris is aglow with placards of "To work; to work." They have realized there what we must realize here sooner or later.

The paying of higher wages to the wage earners and immediately taking it from them again by increased cost of living will not solve our problem.

The regulating of the prices of commodities is only a makeshift. You dare not regulate the price below the cost of production, plus the cost of unavoidable waste, plus the cost of transportation, distribution, and a reasonable profit. To go beyond this is confiscatory, a policy that I hope this body would never think of adopting. Shall we place an embargo on food and shoes and clothing and thereby starve and freeze millions? Is it not more humane to suffer a little longer, suffer a few privations, than to withhold food and clothing from a naked, starving world, thereby committing wholesale murder?

That there has been profiteering is beyond a question of doubt, and it should be severely dealt with when and where found, but from what I have been able to see the profiteering has been general, and is not confined to any particular class. What profiteering there is starts at the source of supply and goes all along the line to final consumption.

The idea of all seems to be, "Get it now, get all you can while the getting is good, and the devil take the hindmost."

It is the duty of the administration, and I hope it is its purpose, to try to stop this profiteering by enforcing the adequate laws we now have. I wish to show, by reading from the Washington Star of August 12, what England is trying to do along this line:

COMMONS FAVOR BILL TO PUNISH PROFITEERS—SIR AUCKLAND GEDDES DECLARES PRACTICE CAUSES UNREST—LABOR GIVES SUPPORT TO MEASURE.

LONDON, Monday, August 11, 1919.

The House of Commons, after hearing Sir Auckland Geddes, minister for national service and reconstruction, declare that profiteering in foodstuffs was responsible for social unrest and discontent, passed tonight on second reading the Government bill providing for prosecution and penalties for persons guilty of profiteering. The bill was supported on second reading by the labor party and the vote on passage was 251 to 8.

Sir Auckland, who is in charge of the bill for the Government, said the measure would have a bad effect upon profiteering. The minister said that a manufacturer in northern England had told him he was "ashamed" of the profits he was making. He added that shoes that sold at wholesale at from 15 to 25 shillings retailed at from 50 to 60 shillings.

He explained that the Government had rejected the idea of internal control of trade and also the idea suggested in America of stamping goods with factory prices and establishing a system for fixing prices. He admitted that the Government had no alternative but to confess it was powerless under the laws as they stand at present.

Sir Auckland declared that the pending bill had not been hastily introduced, but had been long and carefully considered. The bill now is in the hands of a committee of the whole house preparatory to bringing it up on final passage.

The profiteering bill before the House of Commons provides for the establishment of a central authority to deal with those speculating in the necessities of life. Local and county tribunals would be associated with the central authority. These tribunals would be empowered to inflict penalties up to 200 pounds or six months' imprisonment. The bill would apply to England, Scotland, and Wales, but not to Ireland.

The suppression of this great evil will be a step in the right direction and will show our people that our administration is not ignorant of the conditions that exist nor negligent of its duty. However, this suppression of profiteering is only a drop in the bucket in the solving of the problem of getting back to where we were before the holocaust.

By your kind permission I will read you a part of an editorial in the Philadelphia Ledger of August 12, entitled "Is America 'jazzing' when she should saw wood?":

If we eliminate for the moment all questions of hoarding and profiteering and combining in restraint of trade—with which the Government is now pledged to act promptly and fearlessly—there are just two ways left in which a rising cost of living can be met: We can increase the supply of things by making more, and we can decrease the demand by buying only what we need. The man with more money than he requires for the present can not only assure himself and his family against future want by saving his surplus, but he can help the Nation through a crisis by giving it his capital to work with and by releasing goods and labor to the service of real needs. The correlative of this is to work harder. This is not a facetious remark, but a sound philosophic maxim. If a farmer found his woodpile depleted by an accidental fire as winter approaches, he would not seek to cure the trouble by going out on strike. He would settle down and cut wood. He would think it the poorest possible time to choose for working shorter hours or ceasing work altogether. Yet this is the present position of the American people. Any time any man stops work now he increases the cost of living, he reduces the value of his own pay, he flings a stone into the pond of this pressing problem, which sends out widening circles of disturbance that rock all manner of "boats" most disquietingly."

It has been charged that the farmer has been profiteering. Possibly he has, but it is a long lane that has no turn. He has suffered a long time. His turn has come. He is coming into his own.

The urban population has exploited the farmer for years, and he is getting wise. He has decided that if the urban population is entitled to a living on an 8-hour day he is entitled to more than a mere bare living on a 16-hour day.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, can you realize what it would mean to us city people if the farmer and his entire family went on a six-hour or an eight-hour day? What would become of us? It is as plain to me as anything can be that we would have to do one of two things. We would get back to the land or we would starve. I have heard it said on the floor of this House, and no man cared to refute it, that we are all in favor of an eight-hour day.

Is it true that we are in favor of an eight-hour day for all classes? Is it true that we are in favor of an eight-hour day for the farmer? Is it not more correct to say that we are in favor of an eight-hour day for all except the farmer, the man who keeps our souls and bodies together—the man who toils from sunup to sundown; whose wife and children do likewise? Is not he and his thrifty family entitled to more than a bare, lonely existence? God help us when he wakes up and puts himself or his products on a six-hour or an eight-hour basis.

I hope no hasty, ill-considered legislative nostrums will go out from this House to return later to curse us. Would we not be doing our constituents a greater benefit by showing them that the great patriotism and loyalty they showed in war must not cease now; that a more trying patriotism—more trying because free from passion, hatred, and excitement, and one harder to endure—must be practiced and sustained for years?

The press and the pulpit can aid very materially in bringing to the attention of our people the fact that the wealth which we had before the war, and which we all miss so much now, was destroyed, and we must all endure its loss and get along without it until by toil and saving we can replace it, and that it can not be replaced by legislation.

In conclusion let me repeat that our slogan should be and must be "Work and save." [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have always voted at every opportunity against the daylight-saving law. I have always voted at every opportunity in favor of its repeal, and I expect to vote now to pass the bill repealing this law over the veto of the President of the United States. The farmers are unanimously opposed to this law, and the farmers and the small communities which depend entirely upon them comprise over one-third of the population of the United States. The very large vote cast in this body when this proposition was up before to pass over the veto of the President the Agricultural bill which contained an item repealing the daylight-saving law shows the strong preponderance of the sentiment of the country in favor of repealing this obnoxious law. I predict that to-day enough votes will be obtained to pass the repealing measure over the veto of the President.

While the rural population of the country is unanimous in its opposition to this alleged war measure, organized labor, on whose behalf, it is said, the law was enacted, has not asked for its retention. In fact at the great labor convention held recently in Atlantic City, at which all sections of organized labor were represented, a resolution protesting against the repeal of the law failed by a very large majority to pass.

This law was adopted as a war-time measure. The farmers submitted to the inconvenience caused by it and increased largely the food production of the country in spite of the fact that the daylight-saving law made food production enormously more difficult. Now that the war is over, they have the right to demand that this law be repealed. The farmer is the only man who works by the sun. Turning the clock up an hour does not get the dew off the grass an hour earlier in the morning. The farmer wants the old time back in order to work. The golf players and the motorists want the new time extended indefinitely into the future in order to have more time in which to play. This is a contest between the golf stick and the hoe. Agriculture is our most important industry and the interests of the farmers have been too long treated with indifference. What we need in the present crisis in our history is the fullest possible production of farm products. Only in this way can we bring down the high cost of living, and the reduction of the high cost of living is most strenuously demanded by those who live in the cities of the land.

PROPAGANDA.

Members of Congress have been flooded with letters written by heads of manufacturing firms in cities, all drafted in substantially the same language. I have two of them before me now. A letter written by the vice president of Lamont, Corliss & Co., of New York City, advocating the retention of the daylight-saving law, contains this clause:

> We think the farmer's opposition is due more to propaganda emanating from interests in favor of repeal than to any real inability on his part to adjust himself to the change in time.

The letter is dated July 28, 1919. On the same day I received a letter from the Peter Cailler Kohler Swiss Chocolate Co., of New York City, which contains the following language:

> In our opinion the opposition to the law is due more to propaganda emanating from interests who would be benefited by repeal than to any real inability on the part of the farmer to adjust himself to the change in time.

I wrote to both of these firms, asking them for evidence of propaganda, and each firm wrote back saying that the reference was merely a matter of opinion and they had no evidence. The singular thing, however, is that all these firms, including the two to which I have called attention, in addressing letters to Members of Congress and to Senators, used practically the identical language I have quoted, thus showing that somewhere there is a propaganda, promoted by some interest, inspiring these letters, and the propaganda is in favor of retaining the law. Not long ago I received a letter from the head of a tuberculosis cure establishment somewhere up in the Adirondacks. He advised me that he stood for the daylight-saving law, for the reason that an abundance of light and fresh air was needed in effecting a cure for people afflicted with tuberculosis. I wrote back to him and asked how turning the clocks up an hour would increase the amount of sunlight and the amount of fresh air in the Adirondack sections of New York State, and up to the present time he has not favored me with an answer to my inquiry.

During the World War the farmers made tremendous sacrifices. Their boys were not considered skilled laborers, although they were able to handle the complicated farm machinery in use at the present time, and they were refused exemption—those who applied—from military service, for the reason that they were not skilled laborers. A boy, however, who had spent three weeks in a boiler factory assisting in driving rivets—and an easier, less complicated work could not be imagined—was considered a skilled laborer and was exempted from military service. The farmers submitted to these rulings, and after their boys had gone to war—the boys who had assisted them in producing crops—they responded to the demands made upon them for increased production. The women of the rural communities went to work on the farms. Gray-headed farmers who had accumulated a competency, small but sufficient for them with their simple habits of life, went back to the farm to resume the strenuous labors of their younger days, and the result of all this sacrifice was the greatest crops any nation ever produced in the history of the world. The farmers now demand a repeal of this obnoxious law, and if this Congress does not repeal it, they will elect a Congress next year which will repeal it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an item here to which I want to call the especial attention of my good friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. BURKE; my good friend from Minnesota, Mr. CARSS; and my good friend from Ohio, Mr. COOPER, all of whom are members of the four great brotherhoods. It is a letter from the general manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad, dated Philadelphia, August 16, 1919. It is as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD, EASTERN LINES,
OFFICE OF GENERAL MANAGER,
Philadelphia, August 16, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives,
Committee on Education, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request of the 14th instant we show below the highest maximum wages paid to any freight engineer, passenger engineer, passenger conductor, and freight conductor during the month of July, 1919, in the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad, eastern lines:

Freight engineer	$392.35
Passenger engineer	376.85
Passenger conductor	313.90
Freight conductor	308.55

Yours, very truly,
R. L. O'DONNEL,
General Manager.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I am sorry I have not the time. I have only three minutes. Let me show my friends what some of the Army officers are getting, and what the governor of Texas gets. Draw a comparison between these salaries, those fixed by the people and the railroad salaries fixed by threats, strikes, and force. The governor of Texas now receives a salary of only $333.33 per month, which is $59.02 per month less than the maximum a freight engineer receives. The following United States officers in our Army now receive the following salaries:

A colonel in the United States Army gets $333.33 per month, which is $59.02 a month less than the maximum a freight engineer receives on the Pennsylvania Railroad. A lieutenant colonel gets $291.66 a month. A major receives $250 per month. A captain receives $208.33 per month. In other words, a passenger conductor who works six days a week on a safe, comfortable passenger train, eating his meals at reduced rates on lavish dining cars, and having Negro porters to wait on him, and auditors to take up his tickets for him, who receives this maximum salary on the great Pennsylvania system, gets $22.24 per month more than a lieutenant colonel, and he gets $63.90 per month more than a major in charge of a whole battalion of soldiers in the United States Army. A member of the four great brotherhoods is an expert engineer or conductor through mechanical training, during the acquiring of which he never ceases to be a wage earner, while men in the professions and even Army men of high rank need to be highly educated, and during the acquiring of which technical training they often devote many years of hard study and spend every dollar of their earthly possessions.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I am sorry, but my three minutes are almost up. I had only three minutes altogether. I have an item here from the Dallas News referring to the circuit judge who succeeded me in Texas when I left the bench there. It is an account of the fact that he has sent in his resignation to the governor of Texas, and he says that he resigns his office for the reason that the office is paying him only about $10 a day, while common laborers in many cases are earning fully that much. I held this office eight years on even less salary than Judge Burkett receives, and while you may agree with me that he should not have been a "quitter," after getting the people to elect him, until his term expired, still you can not escape the force of his complaint that ordinary laborers should not be paid more than circuit judges.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I want the press of the country to state to the people of the country what the maximum is that the railroad brotherhoods are now receiving. [General applause in gallery.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, in an address made in this Chamber on August 13 by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] animadverting upon the prospect of a coal shortage this winter, and, incidentally, high prices for coal, he stated (RECORD, p. 3851):

> There is neither a car shortage nor is there a labor shortage, but there is a shortage in common humanity and honesty on the part of the coal operators of this country.

I challenge the statement of the gentleman as being unfounded and utterly at variance with the facts in the case.

There is no industry that is subject to more trials and misfortunes, disappointments, and vicissitudes than that of the coal-mining industry. There is no business that requires higher technical skill and greater business ability than that of producing coal. There is no business enterprise that is as harrowing and exasperating as that of conducting a coal-mining operation. The establishing of an efficient coal-mining plant calls for a very considerable investment. There is a very large financial risk coupled with the development of a coal mine, and the man who enters upon it engages in a business venture that may cause the entire loss of his investment. A coal-mining plant is either an asset or a liability. The United States have half of the coal supply of the world. Coal mining is West Virginia's greatest industry. It is the second State in the Union in the production of coal. Coal is shipped from eight of the nine counties in the congressional district which I represent. In this great coal region there are over 400 mines. The district includes the greater portion of the Pocahontas coal field, producing the very highest grade of smokeless and coking coal, used by the Navy, and famous throughout the world. The district also covers the Logan and Williamson fields, whose high volatile and steaming and domestic coals are celebrated throughout the country.

For 25 years I have had opportunity to hear discussed and to observe at first hand the coal-mining industry in all its phases. It has come to my knowledge that there is a vast amount of misinformation on the subject of coal and coal mining. There are thousands who believe, and thousands who profess to believe, that to own a coal mine is the very end of all earthly ambition.

That some great fortunes have been made out of coal, just as out of oil, there can be no doubt. But it is probably true that in the coal business, as in the case of the oil business, more money has been lost than was ever made. It is therefore for the purpose of correcting what I conceive to be a wrong impression concerning this business that I crave your kind indulgence for a little while.

I have referred to the ups and downs of the business. These are almost too numerous to catalogue. But, to begin with, a coal-mining plant must be a going concern. It can not stand still. The overhead is going on whether coal is mined or not. If it be a lessee, the rent is accruing, and the landlord's hand is ever out to receive. It is either a strike or a car shortage, want of orders, a breakdown, or low prices. Let a foreign miner die, and all of that nationality at the camp must lay off until their fellow countryman is laid under the sod, and, again, the foreigner not only celebrates our own holidays, State and National, but his own holidays as well. If the railroad company shall be late in placing empty cars on the siding there is no run for that day. If an explosion takes place, the mine is wrecked. If the railroad men strike, the mine, in consequence, is shut down. If the railroads declare an embargo on a given point, and the operators' coal is destined for that point, the mines are shut down. If an epidemic of disease enters the camp, all employees will be afflicted. When pay day comes—and it comes twice a month in West Virginia—quite a few of the men, following a time-honored custom, lay off for a day or so. The average coal mine, notwithstanding the most heroic efforts upon the part of the operator, works not to exceed 20 days in the month. If the mine is shut down for an indefinite time a force of men must keep the pumps going and clean up the slate falls. In the summer time orders are scarce. When winter comes there may be a big demand for coal, but generally the railways can not furnish the empty cars on account of congested terminals and for other reasons caused by operating difficulties due to conditions of winter.

With the approach of next winter there will be a sharp increase in the demand for coal. There is already a great shortage throughout Europe. To save foreigners from freezing America will be expected to divide her coal supply with them. It was in order to give employment to men at the mines during the summer time, to keep our mills and factories going next winter, and in order to keep the people of the world from freezing that the National Coal Association appropriated $50,000 for newspaper advertising warning the people to buy early and thereby fill their coal bins while a supply was available.

The praiseworthy efforts of the coal operators of the country to relieve, as far as possible, national and international shortage of coal next winter, and the distress that would be occasioned by such shortage, has been met by the charge made here on the floor of this House that the activities referred to were, in effect, due alone to ignoble designs and sordid purposes.

One who invests his capital in farm lands located, say, in the Mississippi Valley or elsewhere in our country will, by cultivation, see his land increase in value from year to year; one who buys property located in most any growing town or city, or in the suburbs thereof, will realize a steady increase in the value of that investment; but one who invests in coal lands undergoing development has an experience just to the contrary. The operator may buy a tract of coal land containing, we will say, 3,000 acres, at a price of $100 per acre, and totaling $300,000. He will then install a plant thereon to cost $700,000, making a total investment of $1,000,000. Let us assume that it would take the operator 40 years to remove the coal from this land. It will thereupon be perceived that the operator must before he takes any profit recover from the sale of his coal his capital of $1,000,000, plus interest and taxes. The interest alone on $1,000,000 is $60,000, the average of the entire term being $30,000 annually. When the last ton of coal shall have been mined the mine will be worthless—the plant the same. The plant will not be worth the cost of dismantling. The cost of mining the coal has nearly trebled, due to the increased cost of labor, electrical machinery, mine cars, steel rails, copper wire, powder, and other supplies. There never will be a return to the old prices. The mines are loaded down with expensive equipment purchased during the war and at war prices, and the cost of which, due to the Government prices as fixed by Dr. Garfield, the operator has never been able to write off. At a time when we were selling coal under Government prices to France and Italy at $2.25 per ton, Great Britain was charging these countries in the neighborhood of $50 per ton to carry that coal across the sea. Again, we had a chance to build up a trade in South America, but the State Department required our operators to consign their coal to British agents. Before these British agents would allow the consumers of South America to have the coal which they so badly needed they required the consumer to sign a five-year contract whereby the consumer agreed to buy all their coal within that period from the British agent. These contracts are still in force and are controlled solely by the British agent, and British coals are used so far as they are procurable for the fulfillment of those contracts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In that connection I noticed an item in the newspapers to the effect that Great Britain would export next year only about one-half the coal it usually did. Can the gentleman inform me whether that is correct?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Undoubtedly the English mines are greatly disorganized. Their labor is certainly dissatisfied. They are not in a position to fill the markets of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres at all, and the world is looking to the United States for its supply of coal. Now, we have a considerable car shortage in this country and it is getting worse all the time. I have in my hand here 26 telegrams from West Virginia operators, directing my attention to car-shortage conditions. A gentleman here from the Logan field in West Virginia, Mr. George M. Jones, was to see me to-day. He is managing director of the Amherst Fuel Co., that has an investment of about $3,000,000 in Logan County, and he tells me that his books show that so far this year his company has lost money by reason of the fact that he has not had the cars upon which to ship the coal that is produced at his mines. There are on the sidings of this country 40,000 new cars—I am speaking of coal cars—bought by the Railroad Administration of the Government. Those cars ought to be put into service. There are 2,400 of those cars on the sidings at Huntington and in the Logan field alone. It is true that the Railroad Administration has given orders that those cars be stenciled and they are stenciling them at the rate of from 15 to 20 a day, but at that rate it will be along toward January before those 40,000 new cars that this Government has bought will be put into commission. It is in order to obviate the possibility of a coal shortage and as a warning to the administration that I am speaking this afternoon, urging that they use every effort toward getting those cars into commission and that they repair the "shopped" cars—those that have already been set aside needing repair. Otherwise, when winter comes on, the people in the cities will be freezing. Then there will be a clamor throughout the whole country. During the whole summer these mines have been practically idle, men out of employment, because, forsooth, consumers wanted to wait until the price of coal went down. One operator told me the other day that he had started up his mine and he had sold 40 cars at $2.24. The price of coal has been low, so low that the operators have been unable to produce it.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman stated something about some proposition Great Britain had slipped over on us about selling coal in South America?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I presume they were exercising the war power. They had plenary power during the war, although their exercise of that power was to the distinct disadvantage of the American people.

Due to a long and intimate acquaintance with the coal operators, I am competent to speak of them, and it affords me pleasure to say to you and to the American people that for patriotism and common honesty the coal operators as a group stand second to no other class of business men in this country. The coal mines of West Virginia are chiefly owned by outside people—men living in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Norfolk, Richmond, Lynchburg, Roanoke, Cincinnati, Chicago, Detroit, Toledo, Sandusky, Columbus, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh. It is true West Virginians are also largely interested; there are men who were once trapper boys and later diggers and afterwards mine bosses who, by reason of their brawn and brain, have risen to the top and are now their own proprietors; but they have lived in a mine camp all their lives and have seen very little pleasure. This man and the good wife who has shared his trials have lived in hope that some day they would be able to get the company out of debt and on a dividend-paying basis, so that they could move out to some college town, in Virginia or elsewhere, and educate their children. If you ask them if they are making money, they will optimistically tell you yes. If you ask them if their company is going to declare a dividend, they will tell you no; that they are putting the earnings back into the plant.

The experience of the coal operator is not unlike the case of a tobacco raiser in Virginia that I knew years ago. Meeting the tobacco planter one day on the road driving his team with a hogshead of tobacco in his wagon, I inquired where he was going. He replied: "I am taking my tobacco to town to sell in order to buy some more fertilizer to raise some more tobacco to buy some more fertilizer with."

The ancients found good in everything, and believed that even a toad had a jewel in his head. And so, from the war and the taxing laws the operators have been held to a system of uniform accounting, with the result that they have discovered what they never before seemed to have realized, that they, under the old system of prices, had been losing money every day they operated the mine. Expert accounting showed them that every ton of coal taken from the mine reduced their capital expenditure just that much, and that when exhaustion was complete the entire investment was extinguished, so that coal must be sold at a price sufficient to cover the original cost of the coal and the plant, with interest, taxes, and other fixed charges, and also to cover the cost of mining.

The cost of coal is bound to steadily increase from year to year. To illustrate, I give you this example: Assuming that an investor in undeveloped coal land is entitled to a return of 6 per cent on his investment and that the cost of the land is $100 per acre and that the taxes will be 2 per cent; the land, in order to carry this charge, must increase 8 per cent annually. Eight per cent compounded annually on $100 will double the principal in nine years. So that the land will increase in value per acre as follows: At 9 years, $200; at 18 years, $400; at 27 years, $800; at 36 years, $1,600; at 45 years, $3,200 per acre.

Let us take, for example, an acre of Pocahontas coal land, for which a low price, according to existing values, would be $500 per acre, and applying the above rate, we have: At 9 years, $1,000; at 18 years, $2,000; at 27 years, $4,000; at 36 years, $8,000; at 45 years, $16,000, as the price of the acre of land.

The man who is only getting 6 per cent is not a profiteer. Very few of us are satisfied with an investment that only pays 6 per cent.

The gentleman from Alabama, in his remarks above referred to, read a letter from Hon. J. B. Densmore, Director General of the United States Employment Service. In this letter Mr. Densmore admitted that thousands of miners had been idle ever since the armistice was signed, and said, furthermore:

> This is due to the fact that coal mines have been shut down, and thousands of men have been forced out of employment. The coal operators allege that this idleness is caused because there has been no market for the coal. Unemployment in certain sections of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio is such as to create distress and want among a large number of miners and their families.

It is usual for coal mines to be idle in summer time for lack of orders. It was for the purpose of keeping the mines at work and giving employment to the men and saving the population from suffering during the approaching winter weather, and in order to keep our mills and factories and furnaces going, that the National Coal Association appropriated the sum of $50,000 to warn the people. This patriotic action upon the part of the coal operators has been held up to public view as only the indication of lack of "common humanity and honesty on the part of the coal operators of this country." A more unfair statement and unjust allegation was never made, and the man who assumes to advise a domestic consumer in this country not to lay in a supply of coal for the coming winter assumes a terrible responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not expect to occupy any more time in general debate upon this bill after having occupied some time on Thursday last, when it was up for consideration in the House, but since that time my attention has been called to a few things by some Members who seem to have an erroneous idea with reference to some features of the bill and some products which it affects.

In the first place, I want to correct the statement that I made in reply to an inquiry on last Thursday, when the matter was being considered. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED] asked me if they shipped ore here from China. I answered, "No; not in that form." I had in mind crude ore, in which there is only a very small per cent of WO_3, or concentrated tungsten; but my answer should have been "Yes." They ship in the concentrated ore. And in that connection I showed the other day this sample, which is a sample of concentrate placer ore from the China field. This [exhibiting] is as it is found there. It has not been concentrated by machinery, as it is in this country, but it is picked up by the Chinese or gouged out of the rock and shipped to this country almost in this shape.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will.

Mr. VAILE. Can the gentleman state whether the piece he now holds in his hand is found in fields where there is extensive blasting, or removal, or where it is not necessary?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. My understanding is that there is no removal of any considerable amount of rock where this is produced. It is virtually on top, gathered by shovels, picked up by hand, in a concentrated form. It is a very rich piece. It does not often contain that per cent of WO_3. This contains 70 per cent of tungstic trioxide, and it is that grade of ore upon which there is no tariff. It comes in free of duty, although it is in its full strength of 60 per cent of concentrates. It requires a milling process to bring to that form the ore that is found in our mines in this country. This sample [exhibiting] is one taken from the Boulder field. Many tons of rock have to be displaced to secure this ore, and then it has to be crushed and concentrated.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will.

Mr. VAILE. Can the gentleman state whether the United States produces all the supply of tungstic trioxide which is necessary for our arts and industries here?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I stated the other day, if the gentleman will recall, that it does not. About from 50 to 60 per cent of our needs is mined in this country.

Mr. VAILE. And then, notwithstanding some stimulation of our industry, which might arise from further development of our mines, it would still be necessary to import some from China, Burma, and other places?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. According to the statistics that are available it is thought that we will for the next three years at least have to import into this country to supply our needs from 3,000 to 4,000 tons.

Mr. VAILE. Then, if the tariff duty was collected on that we would now be receiving a revenue at the same time we are stimulating our industries, whereas we receive no revenue at all now. Is that correct?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The gentleman is correct. And in this connection, it was demonstrated at the hearing, in the judgment of the people who testified there, among whom were those interested in the use of the metal in the hardening of steel, and who testified to the very great necessity of having a dependable supply of that in this country, that with the stimulation such as this tariff would give there would be new fields discovered in this country and other fields developed, so that within two or three or four years the industry would be so extended in this country as to provide for our needs. Until that time, of course, a large quantity would be shipped in and pay this duty and have the effect of stabilizing the price.

I hope you have all read the testimony and report on this bill of the interests that appeared at this hearing. First permit me to say that there were no objections, except from one party from Pennsylvania, who is interested in the South American mines. The Tariff Commission was represented there; and while it is not their province, as we all know, and as they disclaimed at that hearing, to determine the rate of duty, but rather to present the facts before the committee and the people of the country as to the conditions, on question by members of the committee to the parties who represented the Tariff Commission it was developed that in the judgment of these parties, after having made a careful investigation, which they did on the ground in California and Colorado, this amount of duty was actually necessary if the industry was to be developed in this country. However, as I stated the other day, there has not been a mine operating in this country since a few days after the armistice was signed, because of the importation of the Chinese and the Burma ores at a price against which our people could not compete.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. I am in favor of putting tariff on anything we can produce in this country in sufficient quantities and do not produce—I do not care how high it is. With that statement, I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if this duty of $10 per unit, or whatever you call it, is sufficient to encourage and stimulate an American production in such quantities as will supply our own demands?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It is thought that will be true. The hearings developed, in the judgment of those who had given the subject careful thought, that it would be true. And this tariff of $10 per unit is absolutely necessary if our mines here are to operate at all. As I showed the other day, it was coming to the New York market from China and Burma, and selling at $6.50 to $7.50 per unit, and the hearings showed, according to the report of the Tariff Commission after investigation on the ground, that with the price paid for labor in this country, WO_3 could not be produced at a less figure, varying according to the condition in which it is found in the different fields, than from $17 to $22 a ton. So you see this tariff is not going to prevent the coming in of this cheap ore from these other countries. It will still come in until such time as we have developed our industry in this country so as to supply all our needs, when this probably will not be the case.

I know that each Member of the House was furnished this publication in his mail this morning, gotten out by the American Mining Congress, which is most significant, indeed. We all know that nothing appeals so forcibly to anyone as a cartoon or a picture such as this, and in this are graphically portrayed the conditions of the tungsten industry at this time. If there are any members of the committee that have not received a copy of this publication, I will ask a page to put copies in their hands.

First is shown the man producing the raw ore, illustrating the product raw ore. "Tariff, $10 per unit of tungsten. No burden at this point on ultimate consumer."

The second cartoon is the mill; product, tungsten concentrates. "Tariff, $10 per unit of tungsten. No burden at this point on ultimate consumer."

The next one is the electric furnace product, ferrotungsten. The electric furnace is where this product, ferrotungsten [showing sample], is made through heating in an electric furnace and then grinding into this shape. "Tariff $1 per pound for tungsten contained. No burden at this point on ultimate consumer."

The fourth illustration is of the tool manufacturer product, tungsten tool steel. "Tariff $1 per pound for tungsten contained. No burden at this point on ultimate consumer."

Many of you have a vague idea, probably, of the uses to which tungsten is applied, and I have here some very interesting pictures showing the very manifold and various uses to which tungsten in applied, delineating a set of hardened tools manufactured from this product and the very complex machinery into which the use of this metal enters, which is so vitally necessary to the industries of this country. And especially if we should ever be at war again and be at the mercy of the foreign countries we can see how indispensably necessary it will be for us to have developed our resources here to such an extent as to be able to furnish our entire demand.

Now, No. 5, the machine shop where tungsten tool steel is consumed: "The tariff of $1 per pound for tungsten contained is here distributed upon 1 ton of machined steel parts produced by 1 pound of tungsten contained in tungsten steel tools."

Now, there is where the $1 per pound affects the ultimate consumer, and you can see how very small that would be, in view of the extent to which $1 of tungsten would go in the preparation of this steel.

In the sixth picture is shown machined steel, the article of ultimate consumption. "This theoretically carries a tariff burden of $1 per ton on a finished product of a value of $500 to $2,500 per ton," so that you can see the cost to the ultimate consumer from this is so small as to be almost entirely negligible.

Now, when you come to see the advantages and see why the steel men of this country are supporting this bill, you will find that they helped in the preparation of the bill, because they saw the necessity for a suitable production of this article in this country, and for that reason they were perfectly willing to bear this added burden of $1 per pound for the product they used in order to encourage the production and development of this industry in this country. There is in fact no such burden on the ultimate consumer, because one man operating with these tools hardened by this process is capable of doing the work of five. The cause there is thus very apparent to you all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have more than 40 men present. There are just 40 men in the committee now. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made. The Chair will count.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair will count. Fifty Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers can not be had on a point of no quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FORDNEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 22.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to have a quorum for the committee to rise. The gentleman from Michigan asks for tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-nine Members have risen, a sufficient number. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] will take their places as tellers. Those in favor of the motion that the committee rise will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 58.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this camouflage on the Republican side. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that whatever is going on is by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-eight gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 1 and the noes are 58. The point of no quorum is made. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 259 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to use his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has 57 minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN took the floor amid applause.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is protection run mad. It froths all over with protection hydrophobia. [Applause and laughter.] In fact, Mr. Chairman, the most decent thing about this bill, the only respectable thing about it, is its nominal author, who did not prepare it. [Laughter.]

It is conceived, proposed, and written just like every tariff bill that has been presented to the House in the last 50 years by the Republicans. There is not a Republican in this House, not even the chairman of the committee or the gentleman who on its face is designated as author of the bill, who understands or can analyze its provisions, as I shall show later. And why should the Republican Members of the committee or of the House know what is in the bill? Why should they understand the operation of its provisions? It is no concern of theirs to know or understand. They care only to know what rates and what provisions the manufacturers and producers want in the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee may know the amount of the specific rates, because the beneficiaries of this bill told them what the rates in the bill should be. [Laughter.] Not one of them can tell you a line or word of evidence from anybody to show the cost of production at home or abroad of any article contained in this bill. I want to know how you can write an intelligent tariff bill from a Republican standpoint or from a Democratic standpoint without knowing something about the cost of producing the article here and the cost of producing the article abroad. Every Republican platform that has been made since the Civil War, every Republican speech on the tariff made here and on the stump for the last half of a century, has declared that the Republican tariff principle and policy is to write such rates in a bill as will equalize the difference in the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home. That is the Republican theory. As I said some days ago in discussing the chemical schedule, that has not been the practice, but that is their professed principle. Now, there is not a Republican on the Ways and Means Committee or a Republican in this House who can tell this House what is the cost of production of a ton of tungsten ore, or of a ton of tungsten or ferrotungsten even, here in this country.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I should like to say to the gentleman that I think it was thoroughly developed in the hearing that the cost of production was between $17 and $22 per unit, and that after the price reached $17 a unit every mine in this country was closed down, showing that that was the lowest figure at which it could be sold without loss.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not the evidence. The evidence on that point was that they could not produce and sell it at as much profit as they wanted for less than from $17 to $25. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There was not a line or word of evidence that it cost that to produce it. I again challenge any Republican on the committee or in the House to tell me what is the cost of production of a ton of tungsten ore or a ton of ferrotungsten in this country. I challenge them to point to the page in the hearings or in the Tariff Commission's report where such cost is shown or where foreign cost of production is stated. No answer. But Mr. Riddell, of the Tariff Commission, did read before us from a report of the commission that one company—

> The Atolia Mining Co. alone could doubtless supply one-third of the total domestic output at a price of $10 or less a unit and compete successfully in the American market with any important foreign producer even with tungsten ore on the free list.

This is not a "cost of production at from $17 to $22 per tons." Here is one corporation, the head and front of the "big four" monopoly, that can produce and sell at a profit ore for $10 a unit in competition with the world—even if ore was on the free list—and yet this Republican bill gives to that corporation and to the three other corporations of the big four a tariff of $10 a unit—an increase of 100 per cent on a profiting selling price! Was there ever such a monstrous proposition in a tariff bill? The Republican members of the committee did not read all the testimony. They did not read all the report of the Tariff Commission. They did not have to. They did not care to know the facts. They had no need for any knowledge except the knowledge of the desire and demand of these corporations. With such knowledge they felt they were armed with sufficient data and information to prepare and report a Republican tariff bill. And they were. And we have the pending bill. And it will pass this Republican House. But before I conclude I want to show to the House, and especially the new Republican Members, and to the country exactly how this bill and other tariff bills are framed and proposed by Republican committees—how rates are fixed and who fixes them.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I am one of these new Republicans that the gentleman is talking about——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman does not look like one. He looks more sprightly than that. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAILE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether his strictures apply to tariff bills emanating from the other side of the Chamber, as, for instance, that coming from the gentleman from Alabama on amorphous graphite?

Mr. KITCHIN. We on this side do not write tariff bills in that way. We write tariff bills in the interest of the Government and of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. VAILE. And of the particular community?

Mr. KITCHIN. While the gentleman's party writes bills solely in the interest of special manufacturing and producing corporations, who by such seek to get their hands into the pockets of all of the people for the purpose of filling their own pockets. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

I have said that no Republican here knows anything about the cost of production at home and abroad. Although in my friend Mr. TIMBERLAKE's district and in my friend Mr. VAILE's district they produce in large quantities this tungsten ore, they do not know anything more about the cost of it than the man in the moon. They and the Republican members of the committee know what tariff rate the manufacturers and producers told them they want. And this bill is exactly letter for letter and word for word what they said they wanted. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us see about the evidence as to the cost of production here and abroad. I do not believe any Republican on that committee or in the House is any wiser as to such costs than Mr. Holmes, who is stockholder, secretary, and treasurer of one of the "big four" corporations, which corporations produce more than 75 per cent of the total production in this country. The real beneficiaries of the bill are these four companies. One of these companies is the Tungsten Products Co. This is Mr. Holmes's corporation. Of course, Mr. Holmes knew the cost of the product of his own company, but he kept it from these gentlemen, and especially from us Democratic members of the committee. He says in his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means that it is impossible for him or anybody else to tell the cost of production even in this country. He could not or did not tell us even the cost in his own company. Here is his testimony. Remember, Mr. Holmes is the secretary and treasurer of one of the "big four" corporations that are going to monopolize all of the production of tungsten ore when this bill passes. The Tariff Commission shows that these four companies have now a practical monopoly in the ore production. Mr. Holmes was asked by Mr. GARNER:

What is the average cost of producing a ton of tungsten ore in this country?

Of course, Mr. Holmes knew, but he also knew that if he told the cost of production, even with his own company, the conscience of even so hardened a Republican protectionist as Mr. FORDNEY, the chairman of the committee, could not stand such an outrage as this bill. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Mr. Holmes said:

It varies so greatly that it would be utterly impossible to state or to estimate what the average cost would be.

Yet Mr. TIMBERLAKE and these gentlemen who are interested here said they could tell, but Holmes could not tell—and they have not told the House yet. The same thing was true of Mr. McKenna and other manufacturers and their representatives. Not one informed us of the cost, even in their own companies. They did tell the committee that they wanted $10 tariff on a unit of tungsten ore, or $600 a ton, and a tariff of $1 a pound, or $2,000 a ton, on tungsten or ferrotungsten. The Republican Members know, and know only, that because the representatives of these corporations had told them that so often that they have learned it by heart, and they can tell you right away what the specific rates in the bill are. [Laughter.] But the main thing, the very basis and foundation upon which a Republican tariff can be written, according to the Republican theory, the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, not a Republican Member knows. No one told us of the cost of production at home. No one told us of the cost of production abroad. No Republican here can tell us now. How can you write an intelligent Republican tariff rate in a bill unless you know something about the cost of production at home and abroad? I repeat, there is not a word or line of evidence as to either.

But we do not need to leave the question of cost here and abroad to Mr. Holmes. Here is the report of the Tariff Commission. The manufacturers and producers would not or did not even tell the Tariff Commission what it cost them to produce the ore or the ferrotungsten from the ore. On page 30 of the Tariff Commission report, made to the Committee on Ways and Means on June 14, 1919, we find the following:

Any accurate estimate of the average cost of producing tungsten ore in this country is impossible.

Why? Because the experts of the Tariff Commission could not dig it out of these four or five big manufacturers and producers of tungsten ore and ferrotungsten and tungsten. They kept it from them. And the commission failed to send an expert accountant to look over their books. Its agents simply took their word for everything. It is impossible to find out, they say. Of course, no Republican over there knows the cost of production even at home. This is admitted. I have read you what the Tariff Commission said about the home cost. Here is what it says about the foreign cost:

Foreign costs are much more difficult to ascertain.

I do not see how foreign cost could be much more difficult to ascertain than the home cost, when it says that the home cost is utterly impossible to ascertain. [Laughter.]

I want to ask the gentlemen on the Republican side who reported out this bill to tell me and to tell their colleagues on the Republican side and tell the country what human being in this country came before the committee, either in person or by letter or by brief or by attorney, and asked for this bill except the representatives of these corporations, who will have, if this bill passes, an absolute monopoly on one of the essential war minerals. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I pause for a reply. Mr. Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Author of the Bill, where is the evidence? Refer me to the page in either the hearings or the commission's report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman tell what party objects to the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. What party?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The greatest party in this country, the most patriotic party in this country, and the only party in this country that represents the general interests as against the special interests. [Applause.]

Mr. VAILE. And that is the only objection to it?

Mr. KITCHIN. A few weeks ago—on August 2—this House passed a bill placing a high and exorbitant tariff on chemical and optical glass, surgical and dental instruments. I reminded this House during its consideration that the tariff rate in that bill on chemical glass alone levied a tax of at least $13.33 annually, not upon the colleges but upon each of the hard-working, struggling students taking a scientific or chemical course. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I showed, too, that the optical-glass tariff put an annual tax of $300,000 upon the colleges and universities of this country. I further showed that by the surgical-dental instrument tariff in that bill the doctors, the surgeons, the dentists, the hospitals, private and charitable, in this country were taxed, not for the benefit of the Government but for the benefit of three or four surgical-instrument manufacturers, a yearly sum of $5,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I asked the Republicans of the House then to tell me, tell the House, tell the country, what college or university, what student, what doctor, what dentist, what hospital representative, of this country came before our committee and asked that we put that burdensome tax upon them. Not one of them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait one second. I said then with respect to that tariff, as I say now with respect to this, that the people who must bear the burden imposed by the bill were not and have not been heard, and the only representation the people who must pay these taxes and bear these burdens had or have on the Ways and Means Committee and in this House was and is the Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee and the Democratic Membership of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The gentleman stated that only certain interests appeared for this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir; they and their representatives.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. He also stated that the only objection appearing in the name of any party was the Democratic Party.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said the only patriotic party of this country, but that is the same thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Is it not true that we should consider the Tariff Commission, and did it not appear——

Mr. KITCHIN. What?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The Tariff Commission.

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir; not the Tariff Commission; no member of it.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE (continuing). That Mr. Riddell, a member of the Tariff Commission, in reply to a question by Mr. COPLEY, stated that in his judgment—he gave this as his own opinion—from his experience as an engineer and from investigations made by the Tariff Commission, which he accompanied to Colorado and California for that purpose, that it was his judgment—not speaking for the Tariff Commission, recognizing the Tariff Commission was not there for the purpose of discussing rates of tariff but to give the exact facts to the committee—his judgment as an engineer was that 100 per cent tariff was necessary in order to develop and stabilize the industry in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir. I regret the gentleman has called attention to Mr. Riddell, expert metallurgist of the Tariff Commission but not a member of it. I would not have referred to him, but since the gentleman has, I will here make some observations about him and the Tariff Commission. At the time the bill creating a Tariff Commission was being considered in the House I said on the floor that it made no difference what class of men were appointed on a tariff commission, whether all protectionists or all absolute free traders, that it would sooner or later turn out to be an annex of a high protective tariff policy, and Mr. Riddell's testimony and his report to the commission illustrate it. I said then, and I repeat now, a tariff commission will prove, in the very nature of things, even starting out with free traders, an instrument or agency, whether so intended or not, in the hands of high protective tariff advocates. Why? The commission, its members, its experts, its agents, and clerks, and employees hear nothing except protection. Every lawyer who appears before the board represents a protectionist. Every claimant, every complainant, before the commission is a protectionist and asks for protection. Every witness who appears before it or before its agents is a protectionist. Every plant they go to investigate is a protective-tariff plant. Every expert that they send out to investigate a factory or an industry is a dyed-in-the-wool Republican protectionist. For day in and day out, year in and year out, the commission hears nothing but protection, it sees nothing but protection, it breathes nothing but protection. Who do you suppose recommends or gets others to recommend to the commission this man or that man or this professor or that one as an expert to make investigations into this or that industry? I would stake my last dollar that a diligent investigation would disclose that back behind—perhaps out of sight at the time—such recommendations stands some protective-tariff beneficiary or advocate. Let us see about this gentleman, Mr. Riddell.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through with this. Mr. Riddell did come before our committee, and said that while he prepared that report—that is, got up the data for the Tariff Commission—he did not speak for the Tariff Commission in an official capacity, because it was against its policy to suggest rates, but personally he was testifying, and that, in his opinion, the industry needed a tariff of $10 a unit on tungsten ore and $1 per pound on ferrotungsten in order to exist. Now, listen. Here is his testimony, on page 72 of the hearings, stating that these tungsten-ore producers could not produce tungsten ore unless they could get a selling price of from $25 to $30 a unit. To show you what a run-mad, hydrophobia tariff expert and advocate he is, he even makes it $6.50 a unit or $390 a ton more than the manufacturers and producers who came down here proposed to the committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The manufacturers and producers themselves, on page 68 of the hearings, stated that they only needed a selling price of "between $17 and $25 a unit," but this "expert" of the Tariff Commission says they need a selling price of from $25 to $30 a unit. And to get this price he says they need a tariff of $10 a unit! He wants them to get a price of $390 a ton more than the producers were willing to take!

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I am going to get through with Mr. Riddell, and then I will yield to everybody.

He went before the committee. The Tariff Commission, through its members, could not appear, because they could not take any position on the rates. But Mr. Riddell, who prepared all the data for commission's report, could and did. Let me tell you about the data. He did not get any data by examining the plants, by examining the invested capital account, or by examining the cost accounts, or the depletion accounts, or the profit-and-loss accounts. Neither did he nor the commission have an expert accountant to examine the books of any of the producers. If so, it nowhere appears in the evidence. He simply took as facts—and it seems the commission did likewise—what the producers, the tariff beneficiaries, said as to capital and profits and costs of production whenever they would proffer such information and such other statements they would make as to their industry. Mr. Riddell did not know any more about the actual facts than the man in the moon. Nor did he adopt any proper method to find out. He took their word. The only thing he knows from personal investigation is what kind of a tariff and what rates the producers want—not what they need but what they want. And he comes before our committee and peddles off to us, as his personal opinion of the tariff, their wants.

When we come to the magnesite tariff bill I will show you that he went the magnesite producers—the beneficiaries of that bill—one better and declared for a higher tariff than they said they wanted. Is he an expert on tariff rates or cost accounts? No. He is an expert metallurgist. All he knows about the tariff is what the beneficiaries told him they wanted.

I would not be a bit surprised if it would not come to pass one of these days, if we may judge from the avarice of the proposed tariff beneficiaries, that the electric-light producers, the owners of the electric plants that furnish light for our cities and towns will ask the Republicans—and they will get it—to put a prohibitive protective tariff on moonshine and the twinkling of the stars. [Laughter.] They will first go to the Tariff Commission, as the beneficiaries of this and other bills before the House and the committee did; and I will bet my last dollar it will send Riddell out to make "investigation and report," and Riddell will go out and come back with a statement of facts from the owners of electric-light plants and tell the commission and the Republicans how to frame a tariff bill that will protect them against the competition of God's moonlight and gleam of the stars. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me tell you——

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not right now.

Gentlemen, I am halfway serious about this. Riddell is not going to read what I say. He is too busy hearing and reading statements of what these tariff beneficiaries throughout the country want. [Laughter.] He will not catch on. See whether or not I am correct. Introduce a bill to protect the producers of electric light for the cities and towns, putting a high tariff on moonshine, and ask the Tariff Commission to send out an expert to make a report on it, and see if they do not send out Riddell, and see if he does not make a report favoring such a tariff or a higher one. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. A few moments ago the gentleman stated that the Tariff Commission said it was impossible to get information as to the cost of production of tungsten in this country and it was much more difficult to get it abroad; then he followed that up by saying that it was because the manufacturers would not give the information——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman misunderstood. I did not say that. I said they did not give it.

Mr. SNYDER. I wanted to know whether that was the statement of the Tariff Commission or was his own observation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. The Tariff Commission made no such statement. Neither the commission nor Riddell has ascertained the cost of production here or abroad, nor have the producers here given us the cost even in their own plants.

Mr. SNYDER. I happen to be a manufacturer myself——

Mr. KITCHIN. What? Are you a manufacturer of tungsten?

Mr. SNYDER. No; I am not.

Mr. KITCHIN. If you were, you would not stand such an unconscionable tariff as this? [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. I am not saying about that, but I want to know whether the Tariff Commission stated they would not go because the manufacturers would not tell them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that in revising his remarks he use the term "moonlight" instead of "moonshine," so that it will not be misunderstood.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know but they would want to protect that "moonshine" if they could find a way to do it, and no doubt Mr. Riddell, the metallurgist, could go out and "report" a way. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether he did not vote to-day in favor of moonlight against daylight?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I voted for God's daylight [applause on the Democratic side], not for this man-made statutory daylight. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I have shown you that the Republicans on the committee did not know anything about the cost at home or abroad, but they did know what the manufacturers wanted; that this bill is not framed in accordance with the proposed tariff policy of the Republicans. I told you in the beginning that this bill was written in exact accordance with the demand of the four corporations that have a monopoly now and will have a complete fixed monopoly when this bill passes.

Do you gentlemen know of a man by the name of Roy C. McKenna? The Republicans on the committee may know him. He is president of the Vanadium Alloy Steel Co. in Pennsylvania. He has an interest in the production of tungsten ore, as well as in the manufacture of ferrotungsten. He was a star witness before a committee. It is very pitiable, gentlemen, to see how things happen there. [Laughter.] I have been on that committee with the Republicans in charge for a few months, since they got the House, and it is really pitiable to see one of these big, strapping, manufacturing tariff overlords take the stand before that committee and to see the Republicans begin to tremble. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

When one of these manufacturers appears before the committee, after throwing a few bouquets to the majority members, and begins argument for his demands, Mr. FORDNEY, our able chairman, begins to shake—he gets so nervous that he can not wait for him to state his demands, but breaks in and asks, "How much tariff do you want to protect your industry?" [Laughter on the Democratic side.] You see this is the main thing the chairman and the Republicans want to know. This is the essential in the preparation of a tariff bill. He is just "scared to death." [Laughter.] For instance, here is McKenna, a big manufacturer, a star protection witness, and he asks him, "Mr. McKenna, how much do you want?" [Laughter.] Not how much do you need? I really did not know he had asked this question of this particular man, although I knew he had asked it of others, and I knew it was time that he would ask it again. [Laughter.] But here it is in the hearings, page 41. Let me read it to you:

The Chairman (Mr. FORDNEY) asked:

I do not quite understand that. How much duty do you want on tungsten ore?

[Laughter.]

Mr. McKenna, looking right square at Mr. FORDNEY, answered:

We want, sir, a duty of $10 a unit on tungsten ore.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And Mr. FORDNEY and his Republican colleagues straightway put into the bill a duty of $10 a unit on tungsten ore. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. McKenna was also a manufacturer of ferrotungsten, and they wanted to know how much duty he wanted on that. He answered:

The manufacturers of ferrotungsten want a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem, which is now the law, plus a duty of $1 per pound on the tungsten contents of the refined products.

That is $2,000 a ton on ferrotungsten, plus the present 15 per cent ad valorem. Before the war you could buy all you wanted for $1,100 or $1,200 a ton, but he wants a specific duty of $2,000 a ton in addition to the existing ad valorem duty. The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means had been waiting almost all day to know what was wanted, and just as soon as this protective-tariff overlord walked in and looked them square in the face and told them, "We want $10 a unit on tungsten ore; we want $1 a pound, or $2,000 a ton, on ferrotungsten or tungsten powder," and so forth, the Republicans straightway, over the protest of the Democrats, wrote into the bill their exact wants and demands. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Ten dollars a unit on tungsten ore and $1 a pound on ferrotungsten, or $2,000 a ton! This is the Republican ideal way of fixing rates in tariff bills.

They have reported this bill out for Republicans in the House to swallow, and you are going to gulp it down like a duck does a June bug. [Laughter.] But before you do swallow it I am going to let you know what it is. It increases the Payne-Aldrich tariff on tungsten ore 1,100 per cent! The Payne-Aldrich tariff on tungsten ore was 10 per cent, and at the import price then and at the import price that these producers and manufacturers say now prevails such a duty amounted to $50 a ton. They write into this bill a tariff of $600 a ton—twelve times as much as the Payne-Aldrich Act carried! It is adroitly written "$10 a unit," but this amounts to $600 a ton.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Give me 10 minutes more.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I want to ask what the additional cost to the consumer is?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will not yield unless Mr. FORDNEY will give me five or ten minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not do it.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. Remember that the tariff they are putting on tungsten ore in this bill is twelve times higher than the protective tariff of the Payne-Aldrich Act, under which, and also under the Underwood Act, 75 per cent, according to the Tariff Commission's report, of all the tungsten ore we used in this country was produced in this country in competition with all the world. Yet, with those facts staring them in the face, these intelligent patriotic Republican members of the committee were shaken "out of their boots" by these tariff overlords and were forced by them to put in the bill the tariff and the rates they wanted—forced by them to increase that tariff to twelve times what it was under the Payne-Aldrich Act. They put the tariff up from $50 a ton to $600 a ton. Then, on ferrotungsten the duty is increased in this bill more that nine times over that of the Payne-Aldrich Act! The Payne-Aldrich Act had 20 per cent ad valorem; the existing tariff act has 15 per cent. This bill upon an ad valorem basis at normal prices is 196 per cent ad valorem! It is over nine times higher than the Payne-Aldrich Act and over thirteen times higher than the present Underwood Act!

Under each of those two acts we were producing 75 per cent of the ore that we were using in this country in competition with the world. Yet the Republicans are going to gulp this bill down because the masters of these industries want it and demand that this Republican House shall give them what they want.

I am going to expose now a joker in this bill that I know not a Republican on this committee or on this floor knew was in it. The beneficiaries of the joker only knew it. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, and I want to ask the author of the bill, and I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who is one of the most alert, intelligent, studious, and best informed Republican members of the committee—I want to ask any of them—how many pounds of 60 per cent tungsten ore will it take to make a ton of ferrotungsten or tungsten? If you will answer that, I will give you all my time. You do not know, not one of you. I want you all to pay attention to this. Their inability to answer shows how the manufacturers come down here and make this Republican committee do their bidding without question. Now, are you going to answer? I will wait.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. What is the question? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The question is this. Before I ask that question I want to tell the clerk of the committee, who is one of the best clerks I ever saw, Mr. Camp, not to whisper to either one of them. [Laughter.] I asked how many pounds of 60 per cent tungsten ore does it take to make a ton of ferrotungsten, on which you put a duty of $2,000? They do not know.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Is it 60 per cent ore?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Now answer, if you can, how many pounds it will take to make a ton of ferrotungsten.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. A ton of ore which is a 60 per cent concentrate means that it will take that amount in the preparation of a ton of finished product.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; that will make only 960 or 1,000 pounds. I will tell you, because not one of you know. It takes 4,000 pounds, or 2 tons, to make it. I asked that question in order to show that they do not know why they put that $1 a pound duty on it, except that the manufacturers told them to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, sit down. [Laughter.] You would not answer me when I asked you. I will not yield now. I have not the time. I gave you a chance, and you do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Are you afraid of my question?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I am not, any more than I was afraid of your answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do you know that tungsten powder varies and that it depends entirely on the amount of tungsten in the powder?

Mr. KITCHIN. Your question is just as sensible as your implied answer. [Laughter.] When I said "60 per cent tungsten ore," why it could not have more or less than 60 per cent of tungsten. They do not know—not one of them—how much 60 per cent ore is required to make a ton of ferrotungsten, yet it is absolutely necessary to know this in order to explain or justify why $1 a pound or $2,000 a ton on ferro was put in the bill or how much per pound or ton should be put in.

Mr. McKenna, the manufacturers' star witness, says that this $1 a pound, or $2,000 a ton, is put in there as a compensatory duty in order to compensate the manufacturers of ferro and metallic tungsten for the duty levied in the bill on the ore. He testified that if no duty was levied on the ore no additional duty would be required on the ferro or metallic tungsten; that the 15 per cent ad valorem in the Underwood Act would be sufficient.

The bill levies $600 a ton on tungsten ore. For the information of the House I will here state that the standard commercial ton of tungsten ore contains 1,200 pounds of tungsten or tungstic trioxide; that is, 60 per cent of the ton of ore is tungstic trioxide or tungsten. There are therefore 60 units in a ton of ore. At $10 a unit tariff, the duty on a ton of ore would be $600. It takes—what no Republican could tell—two tons of such ore, 60 per cent ore, to make a ton of ferrotungsten, so that on the two tons of ore that is required to make one ton of ferro the duty in the bill would amount to $1,200. This is every dollar to which the manufacturers of ferro or metallic tungsten are entitled as compensatory duty under this bill. One thousand two hundred dollars a ton, or 60 cents a pound, is the exact compensatory duty for the duty of $10 a unit, or $600 a ton, levied in the bill on the ore. Yet these manufacturers have the Republicans to write in the bill $1 a pound, or $2,000 a ton. No bill ever contained a more infamous joker. By putting this across the Republicans on the committee, who will put it across the Republicans in the House, these manufacturers are given $800 a ton protection more than they pretended to ask. This is a clear gratuity to them. That joker gives them $800 more than any Republican on the committee intended to give them. In common honesty and decency the Republicans on the committee ought to move to strike it out. If not, I shall offer such an amendment, and give the Republicans on the committee and in the House a chance to do the honest thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have a distinct recollection——

Mr. KITCHIN. How much more time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, let me have two minutes more, so that I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. VAILE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes additional, not to be counted in the time of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the time is fixed and the gentleman has more time than I have. It is unreasonable to ask for any more time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I wanted to ask a question that the gentleman has not touched.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have only two minutes and I can not yield now. If as chairman of the Committee on Rules he will get the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I learned as a member of the Rules Committee that we took about a million and a half out of the Treasury to develop tungsten——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman learned no such a thing. Not a dollar was taken out or used by the Government to develop tungsten.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas should obey the rules of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, sit down! [Laughter.] In my two minutes I want to refer to one thing more. Dr. Hess, of the Geological Survey, testified that in New York there were three or four firms who had on hand and stored away 4,500 tons of tungsten ore imported from China and other foreign countries. If this bill passes it will increase the price or value of that ore $600 a ton; that is, $2,700,000 on the whole 4,500. He further testified that the producers have on hand and stored 1,500 tons.

If this bill passes it will put directly into the pockets of the producers, by increasing the price of the 1,500 tons held by them, $900,000; that is, by this bill the people will have to pay an extra tribute on the ore now held and stored by these four importers and the producers of $3,600,000. This bill is worth that much extra to them if they never import or produce another ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for just one minute, to make a statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield one minute to the gentleman, although I have less time than he.

Mr. KITCHIN. I regret that my time has expired. If gentlemen will be here when we reach the five-minute-rule debate I will enlighten the Republicans on many other phases of this bill and of the industry it seeks to protect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if during the war he had taken the position on this bill he now takes could he say to the country that he was sustaining his own Government? If he will answer that question, he will say no.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman wants an answer to it, I will say that last year the foreign importations for the calendar year were about 11,000 tons and the fiscal year over 10,000 tons, and that we produced 3,000 tons, and that we got along very well.

Mr. FORDNEY. That does not answer my question. The gentleman from North Carolina stated that this bill would give a monopoly to the producers of tungsten in this country. I ask him whether he would rather have a monopoly in a foreign country upon this important article or such a monopoly in this country? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. We would not have a monopoly of foreigners in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. You did have it on dyestuff until the war came on, when our Government took over alien property, and you will have it again unless the Republicans save you from disgrace. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman says that the manufacturers of this country came before the Ways and Means Committee and the Republicans yielded to their requests in fixing the import duties upon tungsten produced in this country. I call the gentleman's attention to the time when the Underwood tariff bill was being prepared. A committee came to this country from Bermuda, called upon the Committee on Ways and Means, and asked for a reduction of duty on farm products, and among other things on Bermuda onions. The duty on onions under the Payne law was 40 cents a bushel.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a moment. The Democrats yielded to the request of the foreigners and reduced the duty on that important farm product to 20 cents per bushel. The Democrats listened to the foreigners and the importers and not to the American manufacturers, the farmers, and the American laborers. That is the difference between the Democrats and the Republicans in seeking tariff information. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When this war came on the Government appealed to American capital and American labor to produce tungsten in this country, because it could not be obtained from abroad and because it was one of the most important war essentials.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from North Carolina made the statement before he closed his argument that upon tungsten in this country now imported from China and other places the present owners under the provisions of this bill would make about $3,000,000. What truth is there in that statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will give the gentleman that information a little later.

I will state it now. Under the rates proposed in this bill, if the importation of tungsten continues in proportion to the importations of last year, import duties amounting to some $3,000,000 per year would be collected on imported tungsten ores. Practically nothing was collected on any tungsten imported last year or since 1913, for there is no duty on the kind of tungsten that is imported, and my friend the gentleman from North Carolina knew that well when he just now made his grandstand play.

Mr. MADDEN. I thank the gentleman, but that is not quite an answer to the question I asked. The gentleman from North Carolina made the statement that the present owners of tungsten already imported and now in this country, under the provisions of this bill, will be given some $3,000,000. What truth is there in that statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know and the gentleman from North Carolina does not know who imported, and can not say what tungsten came into the country last year, nor can he correctly state how much tungsten is now in store in the United States. I call attention to the fact that he did not say from whence this tungsten came and where it is now stored. But I have less time than the gentleman from North Carolina had, and I will ask the gentleman not to take up too much of my time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I merely want to set the gentleman right.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield briefly to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said that Dr. Hess, of the Geological Survey, not a manufacturer, testified that 4,500 tons of tungsten ore imported from China and other places by four firms are now stored in New York; that the producers had on hand 1,500 tons, making 6,000 tons; that a duty of $600 a ton—it bears no duty now—would make it the value of $3,600,000, and that the fellows in New York would make a profit of $2,700,000, because it could not come in competition until it paid that $600.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will ask the gentleman not to take up all of my time; he is consuming too much of my time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Dr. Hess testified that.

Mr. FORDNEY. We will add a paragraph to this bill which we now have here that prevents any such profiteering. When the Democrats legislated in 1913, when you dealt a death blow to this institution, you had the votes and you had the power in the White House and in both branches of Congress. Did you ask American capital and American labor what effect the reduction you gave on tungsten would have upon American labor and American capital? No. You listened to the foreigner and the importer, sir, and you lent a deaf ear to your own people, who sent you here to legislate for Americans. [Applause on the Republican side.] You cared nothing about the difference in the cost here and abroad when you cut duties in half which were provided for in the Payne tariff law. You lent a deaf ear to that side of the question. You used your pruning knife, and you went as near free trade as you dared. You know under existing law the ad valorem rates collected on imports average about 5 per cent, the lowest in any tariff law ever written upon our statute books, and yet every time the Republicans suggest an increased duty of any kind on an imported article you have a pain. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from North Carolina said that if we were to place a Democrat on the Tariff Commission, in a little while he would be a protectionist. Why, of course, every man who gives intelligent study to the question of protection to American labor becomes intelligent. [Applause on the Republican side.] He develops some common sense [applause on the Republican side] and goes to the Republican Party. Why, just recently a gentleman from North Carolina, the editor of a magazine, published, I believe, in the interest of the glassware industry of this country, a lifelong Democrat, came before the Committee on Ways and Means and admitted in a most humble manner that in 1916, when he said an increased duty would injure the industry, he was in error. He wants the duty now put so high that no foreigner can bring anything into this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what he said. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Name him. There is no Democrat in North Carolina who made such a fool statement. Name him. If there is one outside of an insane asylum, name him.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says only the producer of tungsten was heard by the Ways and Means Committee, that the people have not been heard from. Heavens above, man, can not you remember a few months back, when the people were heard from in November of last year [laughter and applause on the Republican side], and they put your party out and put the Republicans in power? Just as soon as we hear from the voters, after they study the question intelligently, why, of course, they vote right and act right. They become educated and well informed. I may say to the gentleman that the difference between your party, the Democrats, and the Republicans of this country is that you never have—you never will until you become better informed—listened to the American people in the fixing of a tariff rate on any article imported into this country. You know, and you know the people of this country know, that the United States always has prospered, sir, under a protective tariff, and you know that we had—putting it plainly—hard times under free trade. You know free trade increases imports to the detriment of American labor and American capital. The difference between your party and the Republican Party in this: In 1913, as shown by this book of hearings, foreigners came here and asked you to reduce, as I have stated, the duty on an important agricultural product, and you listened to them, and you cut the duty in two. This morning I received a letter through our Secretary of State from the Belgian Government to our Government asking the Government of the United States to reduce the duty on leather goods coming into this country from Belgium. That letter was transmitted by the American consul located in Belgium to our Secretary of State and was received by me from Mr. Lansing this morning. When that letter receives due consideration by the Ways and Means Committee, the Republicans on that committee will give earnest consideration to our people at home before we legislate for Belgium or any other foreign country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman's argument on this bill is just about as elusive as the provision in the treaty of peace with reference to Shantung, China. [Applause on the Republican side.] According to the terms of that treaty as it is now written, we are evidently legislating for the Japanese and not dealing fair with the Chinamen or our own people.

Now, my friends, the gentleman spoke a little while ago about the cost of production of tungsten. Let me say to the gentlemen of the House that tungsten is a peculiar metal. It is used chiefly in the hardening of steel.

USES AND IMPORTANCE OF TUNGSTEN.

Ninety to ninety-five per cent of tungsten consumed in the United States is used to harden tool steel. The addition of tungsten to steel gives it the property of holding its temper at a much higher heat than that at which carbon steel becomes soft and worthless. This property of "red hardness," as it is called, is most important in cutting tools, as it allows speeding up the work to five or six times the cutting speed allowable with carbon-steel tools.

Probably the use of tungsten second in importance to its use in high-speed steel is in making tungsten wire for incandescent lamp filaments. The quantity used is negligible, but the product is of considerable importance.

A small amount of tungsten is used in electric contact points as a substitute for platinum, and steel containing 2 or 3 per cent of tungsten is in general use for saw blades.

Tungsten is an essential war metal. The use of tungsten steel for tools speeds up machine work to five or six times the output per man with the old-style carbon tool steel. Since most munitions and military supplies are dependent upon efficient and quick machine-shop work, the importance of tungsten as a war material is apparent. In the event of blockade, the domestic tungsten industry would be of inestimable value.

The following statement is contained in a report by the Tariff Commission recently printed for use of the Committee on Ways and Means:

No satisfactory substitute for tungsten has been found for alloying with steel for high-speed cutting tools.

And in the time of war, when it is necessary to speed up all industry in the manufacture of steel and iron of every description, tungsten is a most important alloy for making tool steel. Before this war we did not produce in this country sufficient tungsten to supply our needs, and neither do we right now. But the industry is growing. The greatest production in this country is in southern California and in Colorado, and the ore is of the highest grade. Our importations to-day largely come from Chile and Peru. Last year we imported $2,800,000 worth from those two Republics, while from China and Japan we imported $1,800,000 worth, and the balance of our imports, which were about $11,000,000 all told, came from various other countries of the world.

In China tungsten has been discovered by placer mining, as gold was discovered in this country years ago in the California gold fields out West; and it is gathered there largely from the surface. As yet they have not gone down into the earth for ore in China. We do. Our cost of production is greater than theirs. According to the common-sense view of any man who is familiar with the question, our cost of production is twice that of any foreign country. Such was the case before the war, and such must be the case after the war, when we settle down to normal conditions. In this very important mineral, so much needed in this country and used to a greater extent here than in any other country, this question arises right now since the industry is being developed in America, Is it possible that you are not going to encourage the industry here but encourage it abroad, so in the event of another Great War we must look to the foreigner for our supply? Oh, no. That is not what you advocated, my Democratic friends, during war time. You then recognized the value of home production.

Our Government appealed to men engaged in the industry to increase their output, and the sum of $50,000,000 was appropriated to sustain those industries and guarantee to the owners no loss in their efforts. But the Secretary of the Interior refused to use any portion of that $50,000,000 fund in sustaining the tungsten market, and not one penny of benefit from that $50,000,000 was given the industry.

A gentleman calls my attention to the title of the act——

Mr. KITCHIN. We did not appropriate $50,000,000 to that purpose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, the title of the act reads:

CHAP. 181. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

That was the title of the act. What did it mean? It meant that our Government offered encouragement to the capital and labor engaged in the production of tungsten and other war minerals. Now the war is over, and do we want another war in order to beat into your heads that it is necessary to sustain that industry at home, so that in times of great peril, such as we have just gone through, we will not have to depend on the enemy for the supply of an article so necessary in time of war as tungsten?

Oh, the gentleman speaks about the duty being too high, and that nobody knows what it costs to produce tungsten here and abroad. I am not really particular as to just what it costs here and abroad so long as we give encouragement to the industry at home. I am looking to my people at home first, instead of the people abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is true, gentlemen, that members of the Tariff Commission came before the Ways and Means Committee and expressed in a personal opinion the necessity for increased duties upon those products in this country. They have a right when they are off duty to speak their minds, their actual opinions. While officiating as a member of the Tariff Commission, dominated by the administration, a free-trade body, of course that man dare not speak his candid opinion, his own mind. He would lose his job if he did. But you let one of those men have an opportunity and he will tell you what is right. He has studied the question and advocates protection. He has become well informed and knows what he is talking about, and then he talks protection to American capital and American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, permit me to quote from a statement of importations of tungsten ores:

Importations of tungsten ores and value per ton (1910 to 1918).

	Fiscal year.	Long tons.	Value.	Value per ton.
10 per cent	1910	.....	$272,311.00	.....
10 per cent	1911	.....	241,795.00	.....
10 per cent	1912	381	184,518.00	$484.30
10 per cent	1913	766	386,629.00	504.50
	1914	238	129,291.00	542.86
Free	1915	439	215,152.02	490.10
Free	1916	3,012	5,453,632.00	1,810.30
Free	1917	3,733	4,999,498.00	1,339.30
Free	1918	5,471	5,889,473.00	1,024.30

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, the gentleman understands that during that period the price of tools in which the tungsten was used went up several hundred per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. SNYDER. While the amount increased tremendously in dollars and cents, the number of pounds it brought in was not greatly in excess of the needs he spoke of?

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that tungsten paid 10 per cent ad valorem under the Payne tariff. Did the price go down in the United States because of the free-trade provision in the Underwood tariff law? No; but he will answer that war conditions prevailed, of course. Surely they did, but we must not forget that we depend upon foreign countries for much of our supply. From 95 to 96 per cent of our entire consumption in the United States is used for steel tools.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The distinguished leader on the Democratic side [Mr. KITCHIN] drew a dark picture of the burden that will be placed upon the American people, the consumers, by reason of the tariff proposed. Can the gentleman from Michigan tell me how much the average man—the farmer or business man or the man at home—will be required to pay on account of the duty on tungsten which enters into the things we use?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Here is the testimony of a gentleman who appeared before our committee. It will be found in the hearings. He says it is variously estimated by the users of tungsten tool steel that approximately one-fifth of a pound of tungsten is used in the manufacture of 1 pound of high-grade tool steel. The duty provided for in this bill—$10 per unit of 20 pounds of tungstic trioxid—if added to the price of tungsten metal, would amount to 74 cents per pound of the tungsten-metal powder. The duty on the tungsten in a pound of tool steel would be approximately 15 cents. On an average 1 pound of tungsten tool steel will be used in the manufacturing of 2,000 pounds of finished forms of manufactured steel, such as shells, crank shafts, and so forth. Even though the entire duty on tungsten is added to the price of tungsten steel the added cost of production in machine shops using high-speed tungsten tools would be infinitesimal. Extending this increased cost into finished steel we arrive at the ratio of 15 cents per ton, or seventy-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound of finished steel—a very, very expensive tariff on the people of the country; one-thousandth of 1 cent in a pound of steel! Oh, my, what an awful tax on the American people! [Laughter on the Republican side.] But that is about as near as my friend from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, can come in illustrating to the people what an awful burden upon them a Republican protective tariff means. One-thousandth part of 1 cent per pound—nonsense!

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will also note, in regard to that 1 pound that produces the 2,000 pounds of steel, that without it, if we had to use a tool without the tungsten in it, instead of producing 2,000 pounds we would produce about 100 pounds, making just that ratio of difference in the cost of production between what 1 pound of tool steel would do without tungsten and what it would produce with tungsten in it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I received a circular—and I presume every other Member of the House has received a copy of it—which shows that a steel tool made with tungsten will do five times as much work as a tool for the same purpose made of high-grade carbon steel; and in time of war, when wages are high and laboring men are scarce, and when it is necessary to speed up to the extreme the production of all articles in use in time of war, I ask the gentleman, Can we afford to quibble over one-thousandth part of 1 cent per pound when by using tungsten high-speed steel the laboring man can do five times as much work as he can with a tool made from high-grade carbon steel, which was formerly used? Oh, it is so insignificant that the gentleman's whole argument goes by the way of the wind.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] wish that I yield to him now?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I think the gentleman from Michigan had better finish.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman a while ago was discussing the cost. I understand the gentleman's argument is that the tariff is justified because the burden falls upon all the people instead of a few. Is that correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. To be candid with the gentleman, I do not know just what proportion of the entire population that burden would fall upon. It falls on all the people when it comes down to war, because the tools in which it is used make an article of defense against the enemy so much needed by the American soldier. And, again, let me say to the gentleman that in the cost of production in this country if we can reduce the cost of production of an article by employing tungsten steel it means a lowering of the cost to the consumer; and when it is true that a workman can produce five times as much work with a steel tool made with tungsten as he can with a tool made with any other metal, we must admit that that helps to lower the cost of production.

And if in every article of use we could lower the cost of production in equal proportion, then, my friends, we would in a sensible way begin to realize that we can lower the cost of living. The cost of living is high, and it is attributable to many causes. Many things lead to the high cost of living, and we are not going to get away from it, no matter how much we talk through the press and to the galleries; we are not going to get away from the high cost of living for some time. The cost of production must come down before we can lower the cost of living. Let us be reasonable and sensible about that matter.

As to the production of this article, I will show you the amount that we produce in this country. I will show to the gentlemen of the House our production of tungsten in this country last year. In 1918 we produced 4,505 tons and imported 10,491 tons. We produced 30 per cent of our supply. Now that the war is over, the matter of consumption, perhaps, will not be as great this year as last year, but our percentage of production in this country will increase, and I am in favor, if it is possible without going to an extreme, of producing all the tungsten in this country we consume, so that we may keep that money at home and establish an industry of such great importance in time of war.

I will show the gentleman where tungsten came from last year, in 1918 and in 1917. We imported none from Germany; from Portugal, $82,000 worth; from Canada, $36,000 worth; from the Straits Settlements no figures are given; from Chile we imported $1,364,000 worth; and from Peru, $1,456,000 worth; but from Japan, $1,157,000 worth; and from China, $723,900 worth, or a total of $5,993,000 from all countries. It is stated in the report, which I do not have the time to read, that the production in China is rapidly increasing, and the whole world knows that the cheapest labor in the world is found in China and Japan. We must guard against that foreign competition and protect our home institutions and our home capital against that cheapest labor in the world. That is where the major portion of our future imports will come from——

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEARNS. If this mining industry were highly developed, how many men would be employed in the mining of tungsten?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have not those figures before me. I believe that was stated in the hearings, however.

Mr. KEARNS. I see it is stated here at from 3,000 to 5,000 men. Is that all who are employed in the United States? You say in the report that from 3,000 to 5,000 miners would be employed. Is that all that would be employed if this mineral should be protected?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is all that are being employed in our production of from 12 to 25 per cent of our consumption. But you must remember that this industry has sprung up since the war and will gradually increase if protected.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose this should be protected and developed highly, so that it would get to the highest point in the development of tungsten mining in this country. How many miners would be employed?

Mr. FORDNEY. If 5,000 are employed now, at a reasonable estimate I would say from 20,000 to 25,000 would be employed, and each one represents something over 4 people. If 5,000 are employed and we produce 25 per cent of our consumption, multiply the number by 4 and it would give you 20,000 miners. Each laborer represents a little more than 4 people, or an average family.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Therefore from 80,000 to 100,000 people would be sustained and get their bread and butter in this industry if we produce in this country all the tungsten that we consume.

Mr. KEARNS. Your report says that—

Domestic tungsten properly encouraged will furnish employment at fair wages to from 3,000 to 5,000 miners and homes for from 12,000 to 15,000 dependents.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I thought he stated that there were 5,000 miners employed now.

Mr. KEARNS. No.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then my calculation was erroneous. I based it upon 5,000 now employed. If the number is less than that, you can figure it out yourself. If we are producing 25 per cent of the tungsten that we use, multiply the number by 4, and it will give the number who would be required to produce all the tungsten we use.

Mr. KEARNS. I am only reading from the report.

Mr. FORDNEY. What report?

Mr. KEARNS. From your report filed here.

Mr. VAILE. But the industry is practically wiped out now, and there are no proper figures on which to base an estimate.

Mr. KEARNS. I am talking about the statement that if this business should be properly encouraged it would furnish employment to from 3,000 to 5,000 miners.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman understands that the number of men employed in this industry cuts very little figure. This is a key industry.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. CURRY of California. And it should be protected for the benefit of the United States. During the war it was found that Germany, on account, among other things, of having protected her key industries, had a wonderful manufacturing business and military organization, which made 65,000,000 people fit to cope with the world. That was due to her organization and to her protection to her key industries. Now, this tungsten is a key industry the same as dyestuffs. But very little is used in the production of a ton of steel. But the manufacturers of rifles and cannon and men-of-war and the merchant marine and the railroads depend upon the use of a small amount of tungsten in steel. It is for the protection of the American steel industry, which amounts to thousands of millions of dollars a year of steel and tools, that this industry should be protected. Although it is but a small industry, we ought not to depend upon foreign countries for our supply. The national defense requires the production of our supply of tungsten in our own country. I have received a number of letters from people at home asking me to vote against this bill because they are interested in a Mexican tungsten mine. They ought to invest their money in California, where there is plenty of tungsten to be mined, although it needs a protective tariff to make the mining of tungsten profitable in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is correct. I wish to read the following from the report:

The telegram is signed by 22 formerly producing companies (p. 10 of hearings) and sets forth that $2,000,000 invested in tungsten mines and $1,000,000 in 21 concentrating mills will be a total loss unless the market is protected against cheap ores. An average of 1,500 men have been employed, and 6,000 people are directly dependent upon the Colorado tungsten mines alone. In 1918 the average wage was $4.85 per day.

However, the real importance of the tungsten industry to a nation is not in the number of wage earners directly employed. Tungsten is essential to the successful operation of the entire steel and iron industry in general, with its armies of employees. Tungsten is a key industry, and a dependable supply in a crisis would be of incalculable value. To me urgency of this legislation and its prime importance is not the labor directly employed, but the magnitude of the possibilities of its effect on the industrial dependence of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4437 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. CLASSON, on account of illness in his family, at the request of Mr. VOIGT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request in respect to myself on the daylight-saving bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF A PETITION.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House a petition which I presented in regard to the withdrawal of our troops from Siberia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw from the records of the House a petition which he presented in regard to the withdrawal of troops from Siberia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 20, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Attorney General submitting supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the Department of Justice for the current fiscal year and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. C.; Mrs. N. G. Moore, of Mellington, Mich.; G. E. Cooper and others, of Utica, Mich.; Mrs. Priscilla Reid, of Lum, Mich.; William Nelson and others; S. J. Osquith, of Memphis, Mich.; John Austin, of Michigan; C. J. Reid and others, of the seventh district of Michigan; Bertha Kilgore and others, of the seventh district of Michigan, all protesting against the repeal of the war-time prohibition law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of postal employees of the Mount Clemens post office, of Mount Clemens, Mich., favoring an increase of $500 per annum for each regular employee and an increase of 35 cents an hour for all temporary employees; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of A. N. Hamlin and others, of Port Huron, Mich., favoring an increase in salary for post-office clerks; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of Lapeer Commercial Club, of Lapeer, Mich., favoring a Federal highway commission to work in conjunction with the State highway department in pushing forward as fast as possible an adequate highway system; to the Committee on Roads.

Also, petition of Michigan State Grange, strongly objecting to any legislation presuming to remove the ban upon wine and beer until the national prohibition laws shall be made and are in effect; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FOSTER: Petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Athens, Ohio, entering vigorous protest against the so-called Plumb plan of ownership and operation of the railroads and against any similar plan that does not provide for the earliest possible return of the railroads to their owners; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Chicago Railway Equipment Co., opposing the Kenyon bill (S. 2202) for Government control of the packing industry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the National Graphite Co., of San Francisco, Calif., protesting against the enactment of the Heflin bill (H. R. 5941) levying a duty on Mexican graphite; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the James B. McPherson Post, No. 87, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, for increase of Civil War pensions; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of the Polish Publishing Co., of Chicago, Ill., opposing enactment of the bill (S. 1919) to prohibit admission to the mails of publications printed in a foreign language; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of the Indianapolis Live Stock Exchange, opposing enactment of the Kenyon bill (S. 2202), the Kendrick bill (S. 2199), and the Lever bill (H. R. 5310); to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the employees of the post office at Rockford, Ill., favoring reclassification of salaries of post office employees in three grades at $1,800, $2,000, and $2,400, instead of the six grades as at present; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. HERNANDEZ: Petition of sundry grocery merchants, favoring passage of the Kenyon bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HUDSPETH: Petition of Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, urging both producers and consumers to unite in vigorous support of the prompt enactment of appropriate legislation in line with the proposed Kendrick bill (S. 5305); to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of the White Eagle Club (Inc.) of Stamford, Conn., favoring league of nations; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. NEWTON of Missouri: Petition of Local No. 8 of the National Federation of Postal Employees, signed by over 400 postal employees at St. Louis, Mo., protesting against House bill 151, introduced by Mr. Madden of Illinois, and praying for an increase in wages of not less than 50 per cent; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: Petition of Greek community of Brooklyn, N. Y., concerning the question of Thrace; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SINCLAIR: Petition of the Dogden Journal, Dogden, N. Dak., opposing the repeal of the postal zone system; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. YATES: Petition of Air Reduction Sales Co., Chicago, Ill., by B. N. Law, urging the passage of House bills 5011 and 5012; to the Committee on Patents.

Also, petition of Dan A. Brown, Chicago, Ill., urging increase in postal employees' wages, Senate joint resolution 84; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of J. Ira Boyd, Springfield, Ill., urging increase in salaries of postal employees, Senate joint resolution 84; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 20, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou King immortal, eternal, invisible, Thou Judge of all the earth, command upon us, we beseech Thee, this morning Thy holy spirit of wisdom, that with open eyes, seeing Thy love and knowing Thy law, with unselfish devotion, we may give ourselves to the tasks before us, that Thy righteousness may be exalted in the earth, that our Nation may be exalted and be made even stronger and greater in Thy righteous judgment. Command Thy blessing upon the President of the United States, upon all our soldiers and sailors wherever they are, upon every home of this land, that peace and righteousness may prevail, that Thy kingdom may come, and that Thy will may be done in the earth. This we ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law, with his objections thereto, the House proceeded, in pursuance to the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3175. An act authorizing local drainage districts to drain certain public lands in the State of Arkansas, counties of Mississippi and Poinsett, and subjecting said lands to taxation;

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the postal service of the Territory of Hawaii;

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.; and

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Lodge	Reed
Ball	Hale	McCormick	Robinson
Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Harrison	Moses	Smoot

Elkins	King	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Fall	Kirby	Phipps	Watson
Fernald	Knox	Pittman	Williams
Fletcher	La Follette	Poindexter	Wolcott
Gay	Lenroot	Pomerene

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] is necessarily absent, and that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

DAYLIGHT SAVING—VETO MESSAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] may make a request for a unanimous-consent agreement, the record showing a quorum present, the Chair lays the message just received from the House of Representatives before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 19, 1919.

The President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. 3854) for the repeal of the daylight-saving law, with his objections thereto, the House proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for an agreement to vote on Friday afternoon at half past 2 o'clock upon the measure just presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Friday at half past 2 o'clock the Senate shall vote upon the question of the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the veto of the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senate has discussed the measure as fully as it cares to do, and I suggest that we take a vote on it now.

Mr. LODGE. Let us vote now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa requests unanimous consent to the effect that on Friday at the hour of half past 2 o'clock the Senate will proceed to vote upon the question of the so-called daylight-saving bill, the veto of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Iowa insists on his request, I suggest to him that he change it to 3 o'clock on that afternoon. I think we could take it up now and dispose of it, but I will state to the Senator my reason for making the suggestion is that I expect to inflict a speech upon the Senate on Friday, and I do not want this vote to interfere with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to modifying my request at the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado. The only reason why I have asked for a time certain is to accommodate those who are not here now and who want to vote on the proposition. As far as I am concerned I desire no debate. I do not expect that there will be any debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proposed to change the hour to 3 o'clock. Is there any objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. To 3 o'clock on Friday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To 3 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question to inform myself as to whether I ought to object or not. I understood the Senator to say that he has no objection himself to agreeing to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado that we vote now.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that I had no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado to changing the time on Friday to 3 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator object to voting now if we can get unanimous consent to that effect?

Mr. LODGE. It is a privileged question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have desired that all Senators who are interested in the matter may have an opportunity to vote. Like other Senators, I am very anxious that we shall pass the bill, notwithstanding the veto of the President, and if those who are interested in the bill as I am feel that now is the time to vote upon it, that course can easily be adopted by objecting to my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Following up my inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, as he has named Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock, I suggest to him that many Members go away over the week end, and would not the Senator be willing to make it to-morrow at 3 o'clock?

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the differences of opinion about it, I withdraw the request for unanimous consent and ask that we may vote now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to voting now on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the veto of the President of the United States?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to it, but I should like to submit a remark or two before the vote is taken. I do not think it requires unanimous consent—at least I do not understand that it does—to vote now, because I understand that to be the order of business; but if the Senator from Iowa desires to have the request for unanimous consent submitted I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to voting now? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was not here when this matter was discussed before, and I am not going to detain the Senate now with any extended remarks on the subject. I have had much correspondence during the last year or two relative to the daylight-saving matter, and I confess I have felt that it was largely an academic question which could readily be adjusted by the business interests of the country without any law on the subject. It looked to me like a question of fixing by their own motion the hour in which men should go to work and at which they should quit, and that it did not have any influence whatever upon the hours of labor. I have always had difficulty in determining to my own satisfaction how artificial time could be made to improve natural or sun time.

I wish, however, to relate a little experience which I had while I was away from the Senate. I was out in the country and became somewhat familiar at first hand with the way matters are conducted on the farm. At 5 o'clock, when dinner was announced, the help came in from the field and went immediately to their rooms in the home and cleaned up for dinner. After dinner these men left, and the farmer had to do his chores alone, which were very numerous. He said he was helpless to fix the hours of his employees. I inquired about it, and the farmer said the same rule which governed city labor as to hours of beginning and quitting work controlled farm labor, and he had nothing to do about it.

I have had, as I said, much correspondence and have written letters to the effect that I was very indifferent to the subject, and that I could see no particular reason for changing the existing order. I am satisfied now, however, from my own experience that this new scheme is inflicting a real hardship upon the farmers which is beyond their control.

Therefore I am constrained to vote to override the veto on this occasion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Michigan before he takes his seat that it is also inflicting great hardship upon housewives and mothers of families who must get their children off earlier to school. It seems to me that this is a sort of legislation run crazy. If a factory man and his labor agree to begin work an hour earlier or to quit an hour earlier, they can do so without calling upon the Government of the United States to pass a law to change God's time, which is 12 o'clock when the sun is just above meridian.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to correct a very erroneous statement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. There is no such thing as 5 o'clock dinner among the farmers. It is supper.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can not consent to the correction of the senior Senator from Minnesota, because it was dinner that I attended, and it was so announced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the veto of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I am informed, however, that if he were present he would vote as I shall on this measure, and I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is absent. I understand that Senator, if present, would vote the same way as I shall vote on this question. I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and his pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], each of whom would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without noting the absence of my pair, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

The roll call resulted—yeas 57, nays, 19, as follows:

The residence of all of these signers is Oahe, Hughes County, S. Dak.

I hereby certify that the preceding resolution was adopted at said picnic by a motion duly made, seconded, and carried unanimously; and that the signatures attached are those of voters in said township who voted for said resolution.

J. B. IRVINE.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 163, submitted by Mr. FALL on the 15th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the subcommittee on Foreign Relations appointed under authority of Senate resolution No. 106, to investigate Mexican affairs, be, and it is hereby, authorized to send for persons, books, and papers; to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses; to administer oaths; to conduct hearings; to travel to and from any points where a sitting of the committee may be necessary; to employ interpreters, stenographers, clerks, and any other necessary assistants; and to provide for the care and preservation of testimony, papers, and documents.

The expenses of said subcommittee and its necessary assistants in discharging its duties under the provisions of said resolution No. 106 and of this present resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the subcommittee.

EMPLOYEES OF RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has directed me to ask for the immediate consideration of the following resolution which I report from that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 170) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director General of Railroads be directed to furnish, as soon as practicable, to the Senate the following information:

The number of employees of each class engaged on the class I railroads under Federal control in the United States for each month from January to July, 1919, and also for the month of December, 1917; the amount of their compensation; the number of hours or days work; and the compensation per hour or per day for each of said months and for each class of employees, such as engineers, firemen, conductors, brakemen, shopmen, and each of the other classes as shown by the records of the Railroad Administration; also the percentage of change between December, 1917, and the last month of 1919 for which there are available records, both in the unit of compensation and in the average compensation per employee of each class; also to attach to the report on this resolution copies of all orders making advances in wages and of all schedules explanatory thereof.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) to readmit Frances Scoville-Mumm to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read twice and lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) for the appointment of a select committee of five on the high cost of living was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, during my absence the Shipping Board sent to me, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, two bills. One of them relates to the recording of mortgages on vessels, and the other represents the views of the Shipping Board as to the policy that we should follow in connection with the American merchant marine. As chairman of the committee I desire to introduce these bills and have them referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2820) providing for the recording of mortgages on vessels and notation thereof on certificates of registry or enrollment and license; creating jurisdiction in the district courts of the United States for foreclosure of such mortgages, and providing procedure in connection therewith; also providing for maritime liens upon vessels for necessaries, etc., and their enforcement, and subordinating the same to the liens of mortgages; repealing all conflicting acts, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2821) authorizing the United States Shipping Board to operate or dispose of its emergency merchant vessels and thereby stimulating the friendly intercourse between nations and further developing the merchant marine, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with the bill relating to the policy I ask that the letter from the chairman of the committee, together with the standard form of offer and form of note submitted by the Shipping Board, may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, July 11, 1919.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Some explanation is due to you for the delay in submitting a bill, as you requested, to carry out my plan of June 11, 1919. As I promised, I immediately set one of our staff of attorneys to work on drafting such proposed legislation. Shortly after this was completed our new general counsel was appointed, and he asked permission to consider the proposed bill, with specific reference to a sales plan, which I had asked our law department to consider. The view then expressed by our law department was that the proposed bill was not specifically designed to meet the specific sales plan upon which we were working. The preliminary agreement under this plan was just completed yesterday, and our first transaction was closed thereunder yesterday evening, so that until the present moment it seemed unwise to submit proposed legislation which might not be appropriate to our sales plan as finally developed.

From the fact that our sales plan is so new and only one transaction has taken place thereunder, I hesitate even now to submit a proposed bill; but I believe the one handed you herewith will be appropriate to any plan that may ultimately be worked out. Of course, you understand that I may want to submit amendments to this proposed bill while it is in process of consideration by your committee.

We hold ourselves in readiness at all times to appear before you and keep you informed of the development of our plans. I am inclosing herewith our first draft of the bill, to be known as the marine-development act, 1919, and also a copy of our sales agreement as developed to date.

With assurances of esteem, I am,
Respectfully, yours,

EDWARD N. HURLEY,
Chairman.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD, July 11, 1919.

STANDARD FORM OF OFFER.

[Series M. H., A. R. C., July 9, 1919.]

Offer of ——— ——— (herein called the charterer).
Address ———.
Paid-in capital and surplus ———.
Incorporated under laws of ———.
To the United States Shipping Board (herein called the board).

1. The undersigned hereby offers to purchase or to hire with the option to purchase the following vessel of the board ———, and accompanies this offer with a certified check for $50,000. For the purposes of this offer the dead-weight tonnage of the vessel is hereby taken as ——— tons, which figure is accepted by both parties as being more or less, subject to ascertainment by due certificate of American Bureau of Shipping (or, at the option of the board, of Lloyd's chief surveyor for the United States and Canada), such certificate to be established upon and to Lloyd's summer freeboard mark, and to be final, conclusive, and binding as to the tonnage, in respect of which the amounts of the option price, sinking-fund payments, and charter-hire notes herein mentioned shall be computed; and such dead-weight tonnage shall be inclusive of bunkers, stores, spares, water ballast, fresh water, crew and effects, and spare gear.

2. The agreed value of said vessel is $——— per dead-weight ton, which shall either be paid in full to the board within 10 days after mailing by the board of notice of acceptance of this offer or, at the option of the charterer, and within the like number of days, such value shall be secured to the board by the deposit with the board of 20 per cent of such value in funds current in New York City (credit, however, to be allowed for the $50,000 payment accompanying this offer) and by simultaneously executing an indenture in the board's standard form for ship charter and purchase agreement (or in case such standard form has not then been adopted by the board, by then agreeing in writing to execute an indenture in such standard form as the board may later adopt and to protect the board satisfactorily in the meantime in respect to insurance and other matters affecting the security afforded by the board's retention of title to the vessel). At the time of making payment of said agreed value, or of depositing 20 per cent thereof, as the case may be, and as a further condition to the delivery of the vessel, the undersigned will also pay to the board the value of all engine room and steward's and other stores aboard said vessel, including fuel, oil, paints, water, and similar stores, and all deck supplies, such value to be based upon the captain's or master's inventory and on the prices of such stores prevailing at the port of delivery.

3. Said indenture shall be in substance a bare boat charter for three years, with an option to purchase at the end thereof, and shall contain such reservations of title to the board, such remedies in case of default, and such covenants and conditions regarding insurance, repairs, replacements, and other security as are contained in approved forms of equipment lease agreements and in marine trust indentures or ship mortgages and deeds of trust and such other provisions as the board deems appropriate for its protection. Such indenture shall forbid the creation by the charterer of liens on the vessel. This agreement and said indenture, when executed, shall be carried as part of the ship's papers.

4. Under said indenture, upon the basis of $200 a ton dead-weight value, the charterer shall pay for three years for each such ton the sum of $3 monthly in advance, to be evidenced by charter-hire notes, which shall bear no interest until their respective maturities, and at the end of three years shall have the option to purchase at $110 for each such ton, payable, after crediting the amount of the sinking fund hereinafter provided, in full at that time, or, at the option of the charterer, in four equal semiannual installments, evidenced by conditional sale notes secured by the reservation of title in vessel in the manner provided in the indenture, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. If the agreed value is more or less than $200 per dead-weight ton the charter hire and option price provided in the indenture shall be proportionately more or less than the amounts above specified.

5. As additional security to the board the 20 per cent deposited under paragraph 2 and the following payments:

Payment No. 1, due 6 months after the date of the indenture, 3½ per cent of agreed value;

Payment No. 2, due 12 months after the date of the indenture, 3½ per cent of agreed value;

Payment No. 3, due 18 months after the date of the indenture, 2½ per cent of agreed value;

Payment No. 4, due 24 months after the date of the indenture, 2½ per cent of agreed value;

Payment No. 5, due 30 months after the date of the indenture, 2½ per cent of agreed value;

Total, 15 per cent of agreed value; shall constitute a sinking fund to indemnify the board from and against all loss or damage from any cause, including default on the charter, hire notes, or loss incident to the retaking of the vessel during the term of the lease or at the expiration thereof or otherwise. The sinking fund, including the net amount of interest which may be allowed thereon pursuant to the provisions of the indenture, shall be applied upon the option price if the purchase option is exercised; otherwise so much thereof will be returned to the charterer as exceeds the full amount required to indemnify the board, when and as such amount is determined.

6. If within one year the charterer shall desire to purchase said vessel, then he may do so by paying, in funds current in New York City, a sum equal to the agreed value of said vessel as herein stated, less a deduction at the rate of 15 per cent per annum for the period of time during which said vessel was held under charter as aforesaid, and upon exercising such option he may apply on such purchase price all sums then credited to the sinking fund, with interest accumulated thereon as in the indenture provided, whereupon the board shall simultaneously return to him all charter-hire notes for charter hire after the date of the exercise of such option, the object hereof being to put the parties in the same position as if the charterer had paid said agreed value of said vessel in cash at the date of the signing hereof.

7. This offer shall remain for 30 days for written acceptance by the board, but may be sooner accepted. If the offer is not accepted, the amount accompanying this offer shall be returned. If the undersigned shall fail within the 10 days allowed therefor either to pay in full the agreed value of said vessel or to deposit 20 per cent thereof, as herein provided, or shall fail, in case of such deposit, to execute duly the documents required in such case pursuant to paragraph 2 hereof, or shall in any other wise depart from the terms of this offer, then the deposit mentioned in paragraph 1 hereof shall be held and retained by the board as liquidated damages sustained in the cost and expense of having said vessel surveyed and prepared for delivery and otherwise, but without prejudice to the board's recourse against the undersigned for any excess of the actual damages so sustained over the amount of said deposit.

DR. JAMES HARRIS ROGERS.

Mr. FRANCE. I send to the desk a joint resolution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) conveying the thanks of Congress to Dr. James Harris Rogers, of Hyattsville, Md., the discoverer of underground and underwater radio, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas James Harris Rogers, of Hyattsville, Md., has marked an epoch in scientific achievement in radio by the discovery of the underground and underwater system of radio communication; and

Whereas the Navy Department of the United States expedited the issuance of patents to James Harris Rogers by direct request to the Department of the Interior, and used effectively the Rogers system throughout the participation of the United States in the World War, when submarines menaced the ocean, when cables were being cut, and when statics interfered with raised aerials; and

Whereas the Rogers system is being installed in various parts of the world by the Navy Department of the United States; and

Whereas James Harris Rogers, both in peace and in war, has rendered a distinctive service to the republic of science and discovered a vital aid to the Government of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of the Congress be, and the same are hereby, presented to James Harris Rogers for his notable scientific achievement.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to cause to be made and presented to James Harris Rogers a suitable gold medal, appropriately inscribed, which shall express the high estimation in which the Congress holds the services of this scientist.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purchase or manufacture of said medal, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

NEWSPRINT PAPER INDUSTRY.

Mr. REED. I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 164) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the newsprint paper industry and to ascertain whether it is now or has been engaged in discriminatory, unjust, or illegal practice, and whether the prices now being charged for newsprint paper, or similar products, are excessive and the causes for existing prices.

The committee shall report to the Senate the result of its investigation together with such findings and recommendations as it may deem proper to make.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the Federal Trade Commission has not recently conducted such an investigation as the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri calls for?

Mr. REED. There has been an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, but, in my opinion, the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission is not complete and does not cover everything that it is sought by the resolution to cover. I will say to the Senator that if I am a member of the committee to investigate this subject it is not my purpose to duplicate the work of the Federal Trade Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE BOTANIC GARDEN.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer a resolution and ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 165), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, directed to consider and report to the Senate plans for the location and development, in or near the District of Columbia, of a botanic garden of a size and excellence comparable with the best existing botanic gardens.

For the purpose of preparing such plans the committee may secure the services of such experts as may be necessary for a proper consideration of the subject. The expenses of such investigation, not exceeding $3,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Secretary read the resolution again? I did not hear it clearly.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from California what committee has usually had jurisdiction of the Botanic Garden?

Mr. PHELAN. I assume, Mr. President, that as it involves the possible acquisition of land the resolution should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is not a matter, I think, involving the management of the Botanic Garden.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator that I have just become the chairman of the Committee on the Library, and I understand that the Botanic Garden has been under the control of that committee; but I am ignorant as to whether the distinction sought to be drawn by the Senator between the acquisition of sites and the management of them is well taken or not. I desire to ask the Senator, therefore, if he is willing to defer the reference of the resolution until we can ascertain which committee ought to have jurisdiction of it. I would not like to ask that the committee be discharged if it should be erroneously referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will eventually have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course; but it has to come from some other committee, I suppose, before it goes to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and I should like to be certain of the jurisdiction of the committee. I say this simply in behalf of the Committee on the Library. I am not seeking any jurisdiction to which we are not entitled.

Mr. PHELAN. Very well, Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie on the table until the next legislative day, when I shall call it up for proper reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ORIENTAL AND DOMESTIC BEANS.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer a resolution asking the Secretary of Commerce for information, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 166) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas, due to the importation of oriental beans into the United States during the war and since and to the overproduction of beans in the United States, there is now a large quantity of beans on hand for which there is apparently no market: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate all available information concerning the bean situation as it exists in the United States to-day, what market has been or is being created for the beans now on hand, and also a statement as to the importation of oriental beans during the year 1918 and during the year 1919, and any other information which might be helpful to the Senate in connection with the consideration of this subject.

REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MOSES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 167), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to furnish the Senate a complete list of all realty in said District of Columbia exempt from taxation as of the date of the passage of this resolution.

PURPOSES OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OWEN. I submit a resolution which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 169) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States in ratifying the treaty of peace with Germany has done so with the understanding that the meaning and purpose of this instrument is as follows:

1. That there is nothing in the covenant establishing the league of nations capable of being interpreted as permitting the league of nations to interfere with any of the domestic affairs of the United States, or of any other nation, such as matters relative to immigration, emigration, imports or exports, coastwise traffic, or sovereignty within the 3-mile limit of its seacoast.

2. That nothing in the covenant can be construed as requiring the United States to use its military or naval forces except when the Congress of the United States, within its own discretion, may authorize it.

3. That if any member nation should see fit to withdraw from the league, it would not be precluded from doing so on the ground that it had not complied with its obligations.

4. That the covenant of the league will not in any degree impair the Monroe doctrine as heretofore interpreted by the Government of the United States.

5. That the league of nations is not authorized to interfere with the internal revolution of any nation, except in respect to the backward nations under a mandatory, nor to interfere with the readjustment of boundaries by agreement.

6. It is the opinion of the Senate that the reduction of armament should proceed as rapidly as the safety of the world shall permit.

7. It is the opinion of the Senate that the pledge contained in article 23 (b) that the members of the league "undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants under their control" is a moral pledge of the highest international character made in pursuance of the principles enunciated by the President of the United States January 8, 1917, and in his subsequent addresses which were accepted by the Allied Governments on November 5, 1918, in arranging a basis for a treaty of peace with the Government of Germany.

8. The Senate has ratified the treaty upon the express understanding that the Japanese Government will fully and speedily carry out the pledge made to the Chinese Government in May, 1915, with regard to the Shantung Peninsula, and has every confidence of the faithful and early compliance with this pledge.

BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a telegram from John A. Wallman, of Spokane, Wash., with reference to the Immigration Service. I desire to read the telegram to the Senate, as that is about the only way the matter can be called to the attention of Congress unless the department shall act. The telegram is as follows:

BLAINE, WASH., August 17, 1919.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Bureau Immigration discharging employees outright. Inspectors Canadian border working Sundays, holidays, nights, and overtime without additional compensation. Not enough inspectors now to safeguard border from surreptitious entry of Orientals and other undesirables. Policy of bureau inimical to best interests of country. If more money needed special appropriation should be passed.

JOHN A. WALLMAN.

I simply wish to suggest that if this is being done because of the lack of appropriations and if the facts are as set out in this telegram, then it seems to me it is the duty of the department to call the situation to the attention of Congress and to ask for a special appropriation. If the facts are as set out, I think Congress will respond.

THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE (S. DOC. 76).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, and also as a Senate document, the stenographic report of the conference which occurred yesterday at the White House between Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C., Tuesday, August 19, 1919.

The committee met at 10 o'clock a. m., pursuant to the invitation of the President, and proceeded to the East Room, where the conference was held.

Present: Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and the following members of the committee: Senators LODGE (chairman), MCCUMBER, BORAH, BRANDEGEE, FALL, KNOX, HARDING, JOHNSON of California, NEW, MOSES, HITCHCOCK, WILLIAMS, SWANSON, POMERENE, SMITH, and PITTMAN.

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Chairman, I have taken the liberty of writing out a little statement in the hope that it might facilitate discussion by speaking directly on some points that I know have been points of controversy and upon which I thought an expression of opinion would not be unwelcome.

I am absolutely glad that the committee should have responded in this way to my intimation that I would like to be of service to it. I welcome the opportunity for a frank and full interchange of views.

I hope, too, that this conference will serve to expedite your consideration of the treaty of peace. I beg that you will pardon and indulge me if I again urge that practically the whole task of bringing the country back to normal conditions of life and industry waits upon the decision of the Senate with regard to the terms of the peace.

I venture thus again to urge my advice that the action of the Senate with regard to the treaty be taken at the earliest practicable moment because the problems with which we are face to face in the readjustment of our national life are of the most pressing and critical character, will require for their proper solution the most intimate and disinterested cooperation of all parties and all interests, and can not be postponed without manifest peril to our people and to all the national advantages we hold most dear. May I mention a few of the matters which can not be handled with intelligence until the country knows the character of the peace it is to have? I do so only by a very few samples.

The copper mines of Montana, Arizona, and Alaska, for example, are being kept open and in operation only at a great cost and loss, in part upon borrowed money; the zinc mines of Missouri, Tennessee, and Wisconsin are being operated at about one-half their capacity; the lead of Idaho, Illinois, and Missouri reaches only a portion of its former market; there is an immediate need for cotton belting, and also for lubricating oil, which can not be met—all because the channels of trade are barred by war when there is no war. The same is true of raw cotton, of which the Central Empires alone formerly purchased nearly 4,000,000 bales. And these are only examples. There is hardly a single raw material, a single important foodstuff, a single class of manufactured goods which is not in the same case. Our full, normal profitable production waits on peace.

Our military plans, of course, wait upon it. We can not intelligently or wisely decide how large a naval or military force we shall maintain or what our policy with regard to military training is to be until we have peace not only, but also until we know how peace is to be sustained, whether by the arms of single nations or by the concert of all the great peoples. And there is more than that difficulty involved. The vast surplus properties of the Army include not food and clothing merely, whose sale will affect normal production, but great manufacturing establishments also which should be restored to their former uses, great stores of machine tools, and all sorts of merchandise which must lie idle until peace and military policy are definitely determined. By the same token there can be no properly studied national budget until then.

The nations that ratify the treaty, such as Great Britain, Belgium, and France, will be in a position to lay their plans for controlling the markets of central Europe without competition from us if we do not presently act. We have no consular agents, no trade representatives there to look after our interests.

There are large areas of Europe whose future will lie uncertain and questionable until their people know the final settlements of peace and the forces which are to administer and sustain it. Without determinate markets our production can not proceed with intelligence or confidence. There can be no stabilization of wages because there can be no settled conditions of employment. There can be no easy or normal industrial credits because there can be no confident or permanent revival of business.

But I will not weary you with obvious examples. I will only venture to repeat that every element of normal life amongst us depends upon and awaits the ratification of the treaty of peace; and also that we can not afford to lose a single summer's day by not doing all that we can to mitigate the winter's suffering, which, unless we find means to prevent it, may prove disastrous to a large portion of the world, and may, at its worst, bring upon Europe conditions even more terrible than those wrought by the war itself.

Nothing, I am led to believe, stands in the way of the ratification of the treaty except certain doubts with regard to the meaning and implication of certain articles of the covenant of the league of nations; and I must frankly say that I am unable to understand why such doubts should be entertained. You will recall that when I had the pleasure of a conference with your committee and with the Committee of the House of Representatives on Foreign Affairs at the White House in March last the questions now most frequently asked about the league of nations were all canvassed with a view to their immediate clarification. The covenant of the league was then in its first draft and subject to revision. It was pointed out that no express recognition was given to the Monroe doctrine; that it was not expressly provided that the league should have no authority to act or to express a judgment on matters of domestic policy; that the right to withdraw from the league was not expressly recognized; and that the constitutional right of the Congress to determine all questions of peace and war was not sufficiently safeguarded. On my return to Paris all these matters were taken up again by the commission on the league of nations and every suggestion of the United States was accepted.

The views of the United States with regard to the questions I have mentioned had, in fact, already been accepted by the commission and there was supposed to be nothing inconsistent with them in the draft of the covenant first adopted—the draft which was the subject of our discussion in March—but no objection was made to saying explicitly in the text what all had supposed to be implicit in it. There was absolutely no doubt as to the meaning of any one of the resulting provisions of the covenant in the minds of those who participated in drafting them, and I respectfully submit that there is nothing vague or doubtful in their wording.

The Monroe doctrine is expressly mentioned as an understanding which is in no way to be impaired or interfered with by anything contained in the covenant and the expression "regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine" was used, not because any one of the conferees thought there was any comparable agreement anywhere else in existence or in contemplation, but only because it was thought best to avoid the appearance of dealing in such a document with the policy of a single nation. Absolutely nothing is concealed in the phrase.

With regard to domestic questions article 16 of the covenant expressly provides that, if in case of any dispute arising between members of the league the matter involved is claimed by one of the parties "and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement." The United States was by no means the only Government interested in the explicit adoption of this provision, and there is no doubt in the mind of any authoritative student of internatonal law that such matters as immigration, tariffs, and naturalization are incontestably domestic questions with which no international body could deal without express authority to do so. No enumeration of domestic questions was undertaken because to undertake it, even by sample, would have involved the danger of seeming to exclude those not mentioned.

The right of any sovereign State to withdraw had been taken for granted, but no objection was made to making it explicit. Indeed, so soon as the views expressed at the White House conference were laid before the commission it was at once conceded that it was best not to leave the answer to so important a question to inference. No proposal was made to set up any tribunal to pass judgment upon the question whether a withdrawing nation had in fact fulfilled "all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant." It was recognized that that question must be left to be resolved by the conscience of the nation proposing to withdraw; and I must say that it did not seem to me worth while to propose that the article be made more explicit, because I knew that the United States would never itself propose to withdraw from the league if its conscience was not entirely clear as to the fulfillment of all its international obligations. It has never failed to fulfill them and never will.

Article 10 is in no respect of doubtful meaning when read in the light of the covenant as a whole. The council of the league can only "advise upon" the means by which the obligations of that great article are to be given effect to. Unless the United States is a party to the policy or action in question, her own affirmative vote in the council is necessary before any advice can be given, for a unanimous vote of the council is required. If she is a party, the trouble is hers anyhow. And the unanimous vote of the council is only advice in any case. Each Government is free to reject it if it pleases. Nothing could have been made more clear to the conference than the right of our Congress under our Constitution to exercise its independent judgment in all matters of peace and war. No attempt was made to question or limit that right. The United States will, indeed, undertake under article 10 to "respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league," and that engagement constitutes a very grave and solemn moral obligation. But it is a moral, not a legal, obligation, and leaves our Congress absolutely free to put its own interpretation upon it in all cases that call for action. It is binding in conscience only, not in law.

Article 10 seems to me to constitute the very backbone of the whole covenant. Without it the league would be hardly more than an influential debating society.

It has several times been suggested, in public debate and in private conference, that interpretations of the sense in which the United States accepts the engagements of the covenant should be embodied in the instrument of ratification. There can be no reasonable objection to such interpretations accompanying the act of ratification provided they do not form a part of the formal ratification itself. Most of the interpretations which have been suggested to me embody what seems to me the plain meaning of the instrument itself. But if such interpretations should constitute a part of the formal resolution of ratification, long delays would be the inevitable consequence, inasmuch as all the many governments concerned would have to accept, in effect, the language of the Senate as the language of the treaty before ratification would be complete. The assent of the German Assembly at Weimar would have to be obtained, among the rest, and I must frankly say that I could only with the greatest reluctance approach that assembly for permission to read the treaty as we understand it and as those who framed it quite certainly understood it. If the United States were to qualify the document in any way, moreover, I am confident from what I know of the many conferences and debates which accompanied the formulation of the treaty that our example would immediately be followed in many quarters, in some instances with very serious reservations, and that the meaning and operative force of the treaty would presently be clouded from one end of its clauses to the other.

Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, if I have been entirely unreserved and plain-spoken in speaking of the great matters we all have so much at heart. If excuse is needed, I trust that the critical situation of affairs may serve as my justification. The issues that manifestly hang upon the conclusions of the Senate with regard to peace and upon the time of its action are so grave and so clearly insusceptible of being thrust on one side or postponed that I have felt it necessary in the public interest to make this urgent plea, and to make it as simply and as unreservedly as possible.

I thought that the simplest way, Mr. Chairman, to cover the points that I knew to be points of interest.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned—and I think I represent perhaps the majority of the committee in that respect—we have no thought of entering upon argument as to interpretations or points of that character; but the committee is very desirous of getting information on certain points which seem not clear and on which they thought information would be of value to them in the consideration of the treaty which they, I think I may say for myself and others, desire to hasten in every possible way.

Your reference to the necessity of action leads me to ask one question. If we have to restore peace to the world it is necessary, I assume, that there should be treaties with Austria, Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria. Those treaties are all more or less connected with the treaty with Germany. The question I should like to ask is, what the prospect is of our receiving those treaties for action.

The PRESIDENT. I think it is very good, sir, and, so far as I can judge from the contents of the dispatches from my colleagues on the other side of the water, the chief delay is due to the uncertainty as to what is going to happen to this treaty. This treaty is the model for the others. I saw enough of the others before I left Paris to know that they are being framed upon the same set of principles and that the treaty with Germany is the model. I think that is the chief element of delay, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They are not regarded as essential to the consideration of this treaty?

The PRESIDENT. They are not regarded as such; no, sir; they follow this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know about the other treaties, but the treaty with Poland, for example, has been completed?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, and signed; but it is dependent on this treaty. My thought was to submit it upon the action of this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. I should like, if I may, to ask a question in regard to the plans submitted to the commission on the league of nations, if that is the right phrase.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were kind enough to send us the draft of the American plan. When we were here in February, if I understood you rightly—I may be incorrect but I understood you to say that there were other drafts or plans submitted by Great Britain, by France, and by Italy. Would it be possible for us to see those other tentative plans?

The PRESIDENT. I would have sent them to the committee with pleasure, Senator, if I had found that I had them. I took it for granted that I had them, but the papers that remain in my hands remain there in a haphazard way. I can tell you the character of the other drafts. The British draft was the only one, as I remember, that was in the form of a definite constitution of a league. The French and Italian drafts were in the form of a series of propositions laying down general rules and assuming that the commission, or whatever body made the final formulation, would build upon those principles if they were adopted. They were principles quite consistent with the final action.

I remember saying to the committee when I was here in March—I have forgotten the expression I used—something to the effect that the British draft had constituted the basis. I thought afterwards that that was misleading, and I am very glad to tell the committee just what I meant.

Some months before the conference assembled, a plan for the league of nations had been drawn up by a British committee, at the head of which was Mr. Phillimore—I believe the Mr. Phillimore who was known as an authority on international law. A copy of that document was sent to me, and I built upon that a redraft. I will not now say whether I thought it was better or not an improvement; but I built on that a draft which was quite different, inasmuch as it put definiteness where there had been what seemed indefiniteness in the Phillimore suggestion. Then, between that time and the time of the formation of the commission on the league of nations, I had the advantage of seeing a paper by Gen. Smuts, of South Africa, who seemed to me to have done some very clear thinking, particularly with regard to what was to be done with the pieces of the dismembered empires. After I got to Paris, therefore, I rewrote the document to which I have alluded, and you may have noticed that it consists of a series of articles and then supplementary agreements. It was in the supplementary agreements that I embodied the additional ideas that had come to me not only from Gen. Smuts's paper but from other discussions. That is the full story of how the plan which I sent to the committee was built up.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, it is obvious that the Gen. Smuts plan has been used. That appears on the face of the document.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there was a previous draft in addition to the one you have sent to us? You spoke of a redraft. The original draft was not submitted to the committee?

The PRESIDENT. No; that was privately, my own.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it before our commission?

The PRESIDENT. No; it was not before our commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The one that was sent to us was a redraft of that?

The PRESIDENT. Yes. I was reading some of the discussion before the committee, and some one, I think Senator BORAH, if I remember correctly, quoted an early version of article 10.

Senator BORAH. That was Senator JOHNSON.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I took it from the Independent.

The PRESIDENT. I do not know how that was obtained, but that was part of the draft which preceded the draft which I sent to you.

Senator JOHNSON of California. It was first published by Mr. Hamilton Holt in the Independent; it was again subsequently published in the New Republic, and from one of those publications I read it when examining, I think, the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT. I read it with the greatest interest, because I had forgotten it, to tell the truth, but I recognized it as soon as I read it.

Senator JOHNSON of California. It was the original plan?

The PRESIDENT. It was the original form of article 10; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I was about to ask in regard to article 10, as the essence of it appears in article 2 of the draft which you sent, whether that was in the British plan—the Smuts plan—or the other plans?

Of course if there are no drafts of these other plans, we can not get them.

The PRESIDENT. I am very sorry, Senator. I thought I had them, but I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State, testified before us the other day that he had prepared a set of resolutions covering the points in the league, which was submitted to the American commission. You saw that draft?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. No specific action was taken upon it?

The PRESIDENT. Not in a formal way.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. President, I have no prepared set of questions, but there are one or two that I wish to ask, and will go to an entirely different subject in my next question. I desire to ask purely for information. Is it intended that the United States shall receive any part of the reparation fund which is in the hands of the reparation commission?

The PRESIDENT. I left that question open, Senator, because I did not feel that I had any final right to decide it. Upon the basis that was set up in the reparation clauses the portion that the United States would receive would be very small at best, and my own judgment was frequently expressed, not as a decision but as a judgment, that we should claim nothing under those general clauses. I did not because I coveted the moral advantage that that would give us in the counsels of the world.

Senator MCCUMBER. Did that mean we would claim nothing for the sinking of the Lusitania?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, no. That did not cover questions of that sort at all.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood that prewar claims were not covered by that reparation clause.

The PRESIDENT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked that question because I desired to know whether under the reparation commission there was anything expected to come to us.

The PRESIDENT. As I say, that remains to be decided.

The CHAIRMAN. By the commission?

The PRESIDENT. By the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Going now onto another question, as I understand the treaty the overseas possessions of Germany are all made over to the five principal allied and associated powers, who apparently, as far as the treaty goes, have power to make disposition of them, I suppose by way of mandate or otherwise. Among those overseas possessions are the Ladrone Islands, except Guam, the Carolines, and, I think, the Marshall Islands. Has there been any recommendation made by our naval authorities in regard to the importance of our having one island there, not for territorial purposes, but for naval purposes?

The PRESIDENT. There was a paper on that subject, Senator, which has been published. I only partially remember it. It was a paper laying out the general necessities of our naval policy in the Pacific, and the necessity of having some base for communication upon those islands was mentioned, just in what form, I do not remember. But let me say this, there is a little island which I must admit I had not heard of before.

Senator WILLIAMS. The island of Yap?

The PRESIDENT. Yap. It is one of the bases and centers of cable and radio communication on the Pacific, and I made the point that the disposition, or rather the control, of that island should be reserved for the general conference which is to be held in regard to the ownership and operation of the cables. That subject is mentioned and disposed of in this treaty and that general cable conference is to be held.

The CHAIRMAN. I had understood, or I had heard the report, that our General Board of the Navy Department and our Chief of Operations, had recommended that we should have a footing there, primarily in order to secure cable communications.

The PRESIDENT. I think you are right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That we were likely to be cut off from cable communication—that is, that the cables were likely to pass entirely into other hands—unless we had some station there, and it seemed to me a matter of such importance that I asked the question.

I wish to ask this further question: There was a secret treaty between England and Japan in regard to Shantung; and in the correspondence with the British ambassador at Tokyo, when announcing the acquiesence of Great Britain in Japan's having the German rights in Shantung, the British ambassador added:

It is, of course, understood that we are to have the islands south of the Equator and Japan to have the islands north of the Equator.

If it should seem necessary for the safety of communication for this country that we should have a cable station there, would that secret treaty interfere with it?

The PRESIDENT. I think not, sir, in view of the stipulation that I made with regard to the question of construction by this cable convention. That note of the British ambassador was a part of the diplomatic correspondence covering that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. That was what I understood.

Senator MOSES. Was the stipulation that that should be reserved for the consideration of the cable conference a formally signed protocol?

The PRESIDENT. No; it was not a formally signed protocol, but we had a prolonged and interesting discussion on the subject, and nobody has any doubt as to what was agreed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked the question because it seemed to me a matter of great importance.

The PRESIDENT. Yes; it is.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of self-protection, it seemed on the face of it that the treaty would give the five principal allied and associated powers the authority to make such disposition as they saw fit of those islands, but I did not know whether the secret treaty would thwart that purpose. I have no further questions to ask, Mr. President.

Senator BORAH. Mr. President, if no one else desires to ask a question, I want, so far as I am individually concerned, to get a little clearer information with reference to the withdrawal clause in the league covenant. Who passes upon the question of the fulfillment of our international obligations, upon the question whether a nation has fulfilled its international obligations?

The PRESIDENT. Nobody.

Senator BORAH. Does the council have anything to say about it?

The PRESIDENT. Nothing whatever.

Senator BORAH. Then if a country should give notice of withdrawal, it would be the sole judge of whether or not it had fulfilled its international obligations—its covenants—to the league?

The PRESIDENT. That is as I understand it. The only restraining influence would be the public opinion of the world.

Senator BORAH. Precisely; but if the United States should conceive that it had fulfilled its obligations, that question could not be referred to the council in any way, or the council could not be called into action.

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator BORAH. Then, as I understand, when the notice is given, the right to withdraw is unconditional?

The PRESIDENT. Well, when the notice is given it is conditional on the faith of the conscience of the withdrawing nation at the close of the two-year period.

Senator BORAH. Precisely; but it is unconditional so far as the legal right or the moral right is concerned.

The PRESIDENT. That is my interpretation.

Senator BORAH. There is no moral obligation on the part of the United States to observe any suggestion made by the council?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Senator BORAH. With reference to withdrawing?

The PRESIDENT. There might be a moral obligation if that suggestion had weight, Senator, but there is no other obligation.

Senator BORAH. Any moral obligation which the United States would feel, would be one arising from its own sense of obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, certainly.

Senator BORAH. And not by reason of any suggestion by the council?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Senator BORAH. Then the idea which has prevailed in some quarters that the council would pass upon such obligation is an erroneous one, from your standpoint?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; entirely.

Senator BORAH. And as I understand, of course, you are expressing the view which was entertained by the commission which drew the league?

The PRESIDENT. I am confident that that was the view. That view was not formulated, you understand, but I am confident that that was the view.

Senator MCCUMBER. May I ask a question right here? Would there be any objection, then, to a reservation declaring that to be the understanding of the force of this section?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, as I indicated at the opening of our conference, this is my judgment about that: Only we can interpret a moral obligation. The legal obligation can be enforced by such machinery as there is to enforce it. We are therefore at liberty to interpret the sense in which we undertake a moral obligation. What I feel very earnestly is that it would be a mistake to embody that interpretation in the resolution of ratification, because then it would be necessary for other governments to act upon it.

Senator MCCUMBER. If they all recognized at the time that this was the understanding and the construction that should be given to that portion of the treaty, would it be necessary for them to act on it again?

The PRESIDENT. I think it would, Senator.

Senator MCCUMBER. Could they not accept it merely by acquiesence?

The PRESIDENT. My experience as a lawyer was not very long; but that experience would teach me that the language of a contract is always part of the debatable matter, and I can testify that in our discussions in the commission on the league of nations we did not discuss ideas half as much as we discussed phraseologies.

Senator MCCUMBER. But suppose, Mr. President, we should make a declaration of that kind, which would be in entire accord with your view of the understanding of all of the nations, and without further comment or action the nations should proceed to appoint their commissions, and to act under this treaty, would not that be a clear acquiescence in our construction?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, it might be, Senator, but we would not know for a good many months whether they were going to act in that sense or not. There would have to be either explicit acquiescense, or the elapsing of a long enough time for us to know whether they were implicitly acquiescing or not.

Senator MCCUMBER. I should suppose that when the treaty was signed, under present world conditions, all nations would proceed to act immediately under it.

The PRESIDENT. In some matters; yes.

Senator HARDING. Mr. President, assuming that your construction of the withdrawal clause is the understanding of the formulating commission, why is the language making the proviso for the fulfillment of covenants put into the article?

The PRESIDENT. Merely as an argument to the conscience of the nations. In other words, it is a notice served on them that their colleagues will expect that at the time they withdraw they will have fulfilled their obligations.

Senator HARDING. The language hardly seems to make that implication, because it expressly says, "Provided it has fulfilled its obligations."

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator HARDING. If it were a matter for the nation itself to judge, that is rather a far-fetched provision, is it not?

The PRESIDENT. Well, you are illustrating my recent remark, Senator, that the phraseology is your difficulty, not the idea. The idea is undoubtedly what I have expressed.

Senator PITTMAN. Mr. President, Senator MCCUMBER has drawn out that it is your impression that the allied and associated powers have the same opinion of the construction of these so-called indefinite articles that you have. Is that construction also known and held by Germany?

The PRESIDENT. I have no means of knowing.

Senator PITTMAN. Germany, then, has not expressed herself to the commission with regard to these mooted questions?

The PRESIDENT. No; we have no expression from Germany about the league, except the expression of her very strong desire to be admitted to it.

Senator PITTMAN. And is it your opinion that if the language of the treaty were changed in the resolution of ratification, the consent of Germany to the change would also be essential?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. President, in that connection—I did not mean to ask another question—I take it there is no question whatever, under international law and practice, that an amendment to the text of a treaty must be submitted to every signatory, and must receive either their assent or their dissent. I had supposed it had been the general diplomatic practice with regard to reservations—which apply only to the reserving power, and not to all the signatories, of course—that with regard to reservations it had been the general practice that silence was regarded as acceptance and acquiescence; that there was that distinction between a textual amendment, which changed the treaty for every signatory, and a reservation, which changed it only for the reserving power. In that I may be mistaken, however.

The PRESIDENT. There is some difference of opinion among the authorities, I am informed. I have not had time to look them up myself about that; but it is clear to me that in a treaty which involves so many signatories, a series of reservations—which would ensue, undoubtedly—would very much obscure our confident opinion as to how the treaty was going to work.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. President, suppose for example that we adopted a reservation, as the Senator from Massachusetts calls it, and that Germany did nothing about it at all, and afterwards contended that so far as that was concerned it was new matter, to which she was never a party: Could her position be justifiably disputed?

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator BORAH. Mr. President, with reference to article 10—you will observe that I am more interested in the league than any other feature of this discussion—in listening to the reading of your statement I got the impression that your view was that the first obligation of article 10, to wit—

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league—was simply a moral obligation.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; inasmuch as there is no sanction in the treaty.

Senator BORAH. But that would be a legal obligation so far as the United States was concerned if it should enter into it; would it not?

The PRESIDENT. I would not interpret it in that way, Senator, because there is involved the element of judgment as to whether the territorial integrity or existing political independence is invaded or impaired. In other words, it is an attitude of comradeship and protection among the members of the league, which in its very nature is moral and not legal.

Senator BORAH. If, however, the actual fact of invasion were beyond dispute, then the legal obligation, it seems to me, would immediately arise. I am simply throwing this out in order to get a full expression of views. The legal obligation would immediately arise if the fact of actual invasion were undisputed?

The PRESIDENT. The legal obligation to apply the automatic punishments of the covenant, undoubtedly; but not the legal obligation to go to arms and actually to make war. Not the legal obligation. There might be a very strong moral obligation.

Senator MCCUMBER. Just so that I may understand definitely what your view is on that subject, Mr. President, do I understand you to mean that while we have two different remedies, and possibly others, we would be the sole judge of the remedy we would apply, but the obligation would still rest upon us to apply some remedy to bring about the result?

The PRESIDENT. Yes. I can not quite accept the full wording that you used, sir. We would have complete freedom of choice as to the application of force.

Senator MCCUMBER. Would we not have the same freedom of choice as to whether we would apply a commercial boycott? Are they not both under the same language, so that we would be bound by them in the same way?

The PRESIDENT. Only in regard to certain articles. The breach of certain articles of the covenant does bring on what I have designated as an automatic boycott, and in that we would have no choice.

Senator KNOX. Mr. President, allow me to ask this question: Suppose that it is perfectly obvious and accepted that there is an external aggression against some power, and suppose it is perfectly obvious and accepted that it can not be repelled except by force of arms, would we be under any legal obligation to participate?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; but we would be under an absolutely compelling moral obligation.

Senator KNOX. But no legal obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Not as I contemplate it.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. President, each nation, if I understand it, is, of course, left to judge the applicability of the principles stated to the facts in the case, whether there is or is not external aggression?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator WILLIAMS. And if any country should conclude that there was not external aggression, but that France or some other country had started the trouble indirectly, we would have the same right, if I understand it, that Italy had to declare that her alliance with Germany and Austria was purely defensive, and that she did not see anything defensive in it; so when you come to judgment of the facts, outside of the international law involved, each nation must determine, if I understand, whether or not there has been external aggression?

The PRESIDENT. I think you are right, sir. Senator [addressing Senator KNOX], you were about to ask something?

Senator KNOX. I only wanted to tell you that I asked that question because I was a little confused by the language of your message transmitting the proposed Franco-American treaty to the Senate, in which you said, in substance, and, I think, practically in these terms, that this is only binding us to do immediately what we otherwise would have been bound to do under the league of nations?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator KNOX. Perhaps I am mistaken with respect to its having been in that message. I am sure I am mistaken; it was not in that message; it was in the message that Mr. Tumulty gave out——

The CHAIRMAN. May 10.

Senator KNOX. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator KNOX. That it was merely binding us to do immediately, without waiting for any other power, that which we would otherwise have been bound to do under the terms of the league of nations.

The PRESIDENT. I did not use the word "bound," but "morally bound." Let me say that you are repeating what I said to the other representatives. I said, "Of course, it is understood we would have to be convinced that it was an unprovoked movement of aggression," and they at once acquiesced in that.

Senator MCCUMBER. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who sincerely believe that under the construction of article 10, taken in connection with other clauses and other articles in the treaty, the council can suggest what we should do, and of course, while they admit the council can only advise and suggest, that it is nevertheless our moral duty to immediately obey the council, without exercising our own judgment as to whether we shall go to war or otherwise. Now, the public, the American people, a great proportion of them, have that same conviction, which is contrary to your view. Do you not think, therefore, that it would be well to have a reservation inserted in our resolution that shall so construe that section as to make it clear, not only to the American people but to the world, that Congress may use its own judgment as to what it will do, and that its failure to follow the judgment of the council will not be considered a breach of the agreement?

The PRESIDENT. We differ, Senator, only as to the form of action. I think it would be a very serious practical mistake to put it in the resolution of ratification; but I do hope that we are at liberty, contemporaneously with our acceptance of the treaty, to interpret our moral obligation under that article.

Senator PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understand that, under the former method, in your opinion, it would have to go back to Germany and the other countries; while under the latter method it would not be required to go back for ratification.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; that is my judgment.

Senator KNOX. Mr. President, is it not true that such matters are ordinarily covered by a mere exchange of notes between powers, stating that they understand in this or that sense, or do not so understand?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; ordinarily.

Senator KNOX. That would be a matter that would require very little time to consummate it, if these constructions have already been placed upon it in their conversations with you.

The PRESIDENT. But an exchange of notes is quite a different matter from having it embodied in the resolution of ratification.

Senator KNOX. If we embody in our resolution of ratification a statement that we understand section 10 or section 16 or section something else in a particular sense, and this Government, through its foreign department, transmits the proposed form of ratification to the chancellors of the other nations that are concerned in this treaty, and if those interpretations are the same as you have agreed upon with them in your conversations, I do not see how we would need anything more than a mere reply to that effect.

The PRESIDENT. It would need confirmation.

Senator KNOX. Yes; it would need confirmation in that sense.

The PRESIDENT. My judgment is that the embodying of that in the terms of the resolution of ratification would be acquiescence not only in the interpretation but in the very phraseology of the interpretation, because it would form a part of the contract.

Senator KNOX. It might with us, because we have so much machinery for dealing with treaties, but in other countries where it is much more simple I should think it would not be.

The PRESIDENT. It is simple legally, Senator; but, for example, this treaty has been submitted to legislatures to which the Government was not, by law, obliged to submit it, and it is everywhere being treated as a legislative matter—I mean, so far as the ratification is concerned.

Senator KNOX. You mean in countries where, under their constitutions, there are provisions that treaties ordinarily are not submitted to the legislative branch of the government, this treaty is being so submitted?

The PRESIDENT. So I understand.

Senator KNOX. Where there are two branches of the legislative department, an upper and a lower branch, do you know whether it is being submitted to both?

The PRESIDENT. I think not, sir. I am not certain about that; but my memory is it is not.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, the idea has struck me and I have entertained the view, since reading the treaty and the league, that Germany having signed the treaty but not being yet a member of the league, any reservations which we might make here would be met by Germany's either joining the league or refusing to join the league. It would not be submitted to her at all now, because she is not a member of the league? You catch the point?

The PRESIDENT. Yes. I differ with you there, Senator. One of the reasons for putting the league in the treaty was that Germany was not going to be admitted to the league immediately, and we felt that it was very necessary that we should get her acknowledgment—acceptance—of the league as an international authority, partly because we were excluding her, so that she would thereafter have no ground for questioning such authority as the league might exercise under its covenant.

Senator FALL. Precisely.

The PRESIDENT. Therefore, I think it would be necessary for her to acquiesce in a league the powers of which were differently construed.

Senator FALL. Precisely; but her acquiescence would be by her accepting the invitation, when extended, either to join the league or not to join the league. In other words, upon ratification by three of the powers a status of peace is established, and as to those three powers and Germany all the rules and regulations contained in the treaty of peace become operative. As to the other nations which have not ratified, the status of peace exists; that is, war has terminated. Now, that being the case, and Germany being out of the league—not having been invited to join the league—if in ratifying the treaty we ratify it with certain explanations or reservations, even in the ratifying resolution, when the time comes and Germany is invited to become a member of the league, or when she applies, under the admission clause of the league, for membership therein, if she enters she of course accepts our reservations. If she makes a qualified application, then it is for the league itself to consider whether she will be admitted?

The PRESIDENT. I do not follow your reasoning in the matter, Senator, because this is not merely a question of either membership or nonmembership. The covenant is a part of the treaty, it is a part of the treaty which she has signed, and we are not at liberty to change any part of that treaty without the acquiescence of the other contracting party.

Senator FALL. Well, Mr. President, of course it is not my purpose to enter into an argument, but we are here for information. There are provisions for the amendment of the articles. Germany is out of the league. Any amendment proposed by the other members of the league prior to her coming into the league would not be submitted to her, would it, she not being a member?

The PRESIDENT. I will admit that that point had not occurred to me. No, she would not.

Senator FALL. Then so far as we are concerned we could make a recommendation in the nature of an amendment.

Senator PITTMAN. She has already agreed by this treaty that she has signed that the members may amend it.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator FALL. Precisely, and we could come in with an amendment.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Did I understand your first reply to Senator FALL to be that Germany under this treaty already had a relationship to the league by reason of its international character, and its participation in a number of questions that Germany was interested in?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator HITCHCOCK. So that it has a relationship to the league of nations even before the time that it may apply for membership.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator MCCUMBER. Mr. President, you answered one question that I think possibly may need a little elucidation. If I remember rightly, in reference to reparation your statement was that the commission would have to decide whether the United States should claim her proportion of the reparation.

The PRESIDENT. That the commission would have to do it? No; we decide whether we claim it or not.

Senator MCCUMBER. That is what I want to make clear. I think the question was asked if the commission was to decide that, and I thought your answer said yes. That is the reason I asked the question.

The PRESIDENT. The claim would have to come from us, of course.

Senator MCCUMBER. It would have to be through an act of Congress, would it not?

The PRESIDENT. I would have to be instructed about that, Senator. I do not know.

Senator MCCUMBER. Whatever right the United States would receive under the treaty for reparation or indemnity is one that runs to the United States, and therefore to divest ourselves of that right would require an act of Congress.

The PRESIDENT. To divest ourselves of it? I suppose so.

Senator KNOX. In the question of the Japanese indemnity, that was done by a joint resolution.

Senator MCCUMBER. I thought the President said it would have to be decided by the constituted authority.

Senator KNOX. I did not understand that he said that.

Senator SWANSON. I understand that the reparation is to be decided upon a representation made by the associated powers. It would seem that the President under that agreement with France, Great Britain, and other nations would have to submit it to the Senate for ratification, and the agreement would have to be reported.

Senator MCCUMBER. In each case it would have the force of law.

Senator SWANSON. If the Senate wanted to ratify it, it would take an act of Congress.

Senator WILLIAMS. This question of reparation does not in any way affect our rights to prewar indemnities.

The PRESIDENT. That is expressly stated.

Senator WILLIAMS. That is expressly stated. Now, then, one other question. Germany has signed this treaty with the covenant of the league in it, and she is subject to be dealt with as a nonmember under the treaty, and has very much fewer privileges than a member?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator NEW. Mr. President, may I ask a question there? What effort was made by the delegates there to prevent the proceedings of the reparations committee being required to be secret?

The PRESIDENT. I beg your pardon, Senator.

Senator NEW. What effort, if any, was made by the American delegates to prevent the proceedings of the reparation commission from being required to be secret, and did the American delegates protest that America be omitted from this commission on account of that thing?

The PRESIDENT. Nothing was said about it, that I remember.

Senator BORAH. Mr. President, coming back for a moment to the subject from which we were diverted a moment ago, and coupling with article 10 article 11, in order that we may have the construction of the committee which framed the league as to both of those articles, as I understand it from your statement, the committee's view was that the obligations under articles 10 and 11, whatever they are, are moral obligations.

The PRESIDENT. Remind me of the eleventh. I do not remember that by number.

Senator BORAH (reading):

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

What I am particularly anxious to know is whether or not the construction which was placed upon these two articles by the committee which framed the league was that it was a binding obligation from a legal standpoint, or merely a moral obligation.

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I tried to answer with regard to article 10.

Senator BORAH. Yes; exactly.

The PRESIDENT. I would apply it equally with regard to article 11, though I ought to hasten to say that we did not formulate these interpretations. I can only speak from my confident impression from the debates that accompanied the formulation of the covenant.

Senator BORAH. Yes; I understand; and your construction of article 11 is the same as that of article 10?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BORAH. As to the question of legal obligation. That is all I desire to ask at present.

Senator HARDING. Right there, Mr. President, if there is nothing more than a moral obligation on the part of any member of the league, what avail articles 10 and 11?

The PRESIDENT. Why, Senator, it is surprising that that question should be asked. If we undertake an obligation, we are bound in the most solemn way to carry it out.

Senator HARDING. If you believe there is nothing more to this than a moral obligation, any nation will assume a moral obligation on its own account. Is it a moral obligation? The point I am trying to get at is, Suppose something arises affecting the peace of the world, and the council takes steps as provided here to conserve or preserve, and announces its decision, and every nation in the league takes advantage of the construction that you place upon these articles and says, "Well, this is only a moral obligation, and we assume that the nation involved does not deserve our participation or protection," and the whole thing amounts to nothing but an expression of the league council.

The PRESIDENT. There is a national good conscience in such a matter. I should think that was one of the most serious things that could possibly happen. When I speak of a legal obligation, I mean one that specifically binds you to do a particular thing under certain sanctions. That is a legal obligation. Now a moral obligation is of course superior to a legal obligation, and, if I may say so, has a greater binding force; only there always remains in the moral obligation the right to exercise one's judgment as to whether it is indeed incumbent upon one in those circumstances to do that thing. In every moral obligation there is an element of judgment. In a legal obligation there is no element of judgment.

Senator JOHNSON of California. But, Mr. President, when a moral obligation is undoubted it will impel action more readily than a legal obligation.

The PRESIDENT. If it is undoubted, yes; but that involves the circumstances of the particular case, Senator.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; necessarily.

Senator HARDING. In answering Senator KNOX a moment ago you spoke of a compelling moral obligation. Would you think that any less binding than a specific legal obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Not less binding, but operative in a different way because of the element of judgment.

Senator HARDING. But not less likely to involve us in armed participation?

The PRESIDENT. In trifling matters very much less likely.

Senator HARDING. To clear my slow mind, let me take a specific case. Suppose the allotted territory which comes under the control of Italy should in some way be assailed from the Balkan States and the council of the league should immediately look upon that as a threat of war involving other nations and should say that the nations of the league should immediately contribute an armed force to stop that war or to bring the attacking nation to terms, would we be a perfidious people, if I may use that term, or would we violate our obligations, if we failed to participate in the defense of Italy?

The PRESIDENT. We would be our own judges as to whether we were obliged in those circumstances to act in that way or not.

Senator HITCHCOCK. In such a case the council would only act unanimously, and our representative on the council of course would have to concur in any advice given.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; we would always in such case advise ourselves.

Senator WILLIAMS. But if in such case, Mr. President, we concluded that the case provided for and prescribed had arisen and that the extraneous attack existed and that it fell within the terms of the treaty, then we would be untrue if we did not keep our word?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Senator BORAH. In other words, then, that transfers the power to decide whether we should act from the Congress of the United States to one individual who sits on the council.

Senator WILLIAMS. No, it does not; it merely provides that when the council acts in accordance with the prescribed terms and we see that it has acted, then Congress will, as a matter of faith-keeping, act itself; and, if Congress does not, Congress will do a dishonorable thing.

Senator BORAH. Precisely so; so that the matter gets back to the point where one individual has bound Congress.

Senator HITCHCOCK. I hope my question to the President will not be interpreted in that way. My question to the President was whether the matter would even come before this country as the advice of the council until the American representative had concurred with the other eight members of the council. After he had concurred it would then be up to Congress to decide.

The PRESIDENT. You are quite right, Senator. And let me suggest that I find nothing was more clearly in the consciousness of the men who were discussing these very important matters than that most of the nations concerned had popular governments. They were all the time aware of the fact that it would depend upon the approving or disapproving state of opinion of their countries how their representatives in the council would vote in matters of this sort; and it is inconceivable to me that, unless the opinion of the United States, the moral and practical judgment of the people of the United States, approved, the representative of the United States on the council should vote any such advice as would lead us into war.

Senator BORAH. Mr. President, does the special alliance treaty with France which has been submitted to us rest upon any other basis as to legal and moral obligation than that of article 10 and article 11 which you have just described?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Senator BORAH. That is also, as you understand it, simply our moral obligations which we enter into with France?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator WILLIAMS. All international obligations are moral ones.

Senator PITTMAN. There is one thing I do not understand about Senator BORAH's question. He has stated that he gathers from what you said that it all rests with our representative on the council. Even if our representative on the council advises as a member of the council, and the council is unanimous, is it not then still up to Congress either to accept or reject that advice?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; but I understood the Senator to mean that it would be dependent on our representative.

Senator JOHNSON of California. May I take the example that was just suggested concerning the Balkan States and a possible attack upon the new territories of Italy. Assuming that that is a case of external aggression by the Balkan States concerning the new territory that Italy has acquired by the peace treaty, upon us rests a compelling moral obligation to do our part in preventing that, does there not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And that compelling moral obligation would require us to use such means as would seem appropriate, either economic or force? Is not that correct?

The PRESIDENT. Deemed appropriate by whom? That is really the point.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Of course, deemed appropriate for the purpose of preventing and frustrating the aggression.

The PRESIDENT. Deemed by us appropriate?

Senator JOHNSON of California. I assume of necessity it would have to be deemed by us to bind us as a compelling moral obligation to prevent the aggression in the case named.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I think, due to my own fault, I do not fully comprehend your distinction between a moral and a legal obligation in a treaty. If we enter into a treaty with France to defend her against aggression from Germany for any length of time, that is a legal obligation, is it not?

The PRESIDENT. Legal in the sense that a treaty is of binding force; yes.

Senator MCCUMBER. Yes; that is what I meant. It is as legal as any treaty could be made legal, and there is also a moral obligation to keep that treaty, is there not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir. I happened to hear Senator KNOX say what I am glad to adopt. It is a legal obligation with a moral sanction.

Senator BORAH. That is true generally, is it not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, Senator; but I have already defined in what special sense I use the word "legal."

Senator MCCUMBER. To my mind those two articles are legal obligations to be carried out by the moral conscience of the American people if the conditions justify it.

The PRESIDENT. You see we are speaking of two different fields, and therefore the language does not fit. In international law the word "legal" does not mean the same as in national law, and the word hardly applies.

Senator BORAH. I wish to ask some questions in regard to the secret treaties. I do not feel as free about those matters as I do about the league, because there are certain things that I recognize may not be entirely open for public consideration; but, nevertheless, in so far as we can, I should like to know when the first knowledge came to this Government with reference to the secret treaties between Japan, Great Britain, Italy, and France concerning the German possessions in Shantung?

The PRESIDENT. I thought that Secretary Lansing had looked that up and told you. I can only reply from my own knowledge, and my own knowledge came after I reached Paris.

Senator BORAH. We did get a reply from Mr. Lansing to the same effect so far as he was concerned. When did the secret treaties between Great Britain, France, and the other nations of Europe with reference to certain adjustments in Europe first come to your knowledge? Was that after you had reached Paris also?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; the whole series of understandings were disclosed to me for the first time then.

Senator BORAH. Then we had no knowledge of these secret treaties, as far as our Government was concerned, until you reached Paris?

The PRESIDENT. Not unless there was information at the State Department of which I knew nothing.

Senator BORAH. Do you know when the secret treaties between Japan, Great Britain, and the other countries were first made known to China?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; I do not. I remember a meeting of what was popularly called the council of ten, after our reaching Paris, in which it was first suggested that all these understandings should be laid upon the table of the conference. That was some time after we reached there, and I do not know whether that was China's first knowledge of these matters or not.

Senator BORAH. Would it be proper for me to ask if Great Britain and France insisted upon maintaining these secret treaties at the peace conference as they were made?

The PRESIDENT. I think it is proper for me to answer that question, sir. I will put it in this way: They felt that they could not recede from them, that is to say, that they were bound by them, but when they involved general interests such as they realized were involved, they were quite willing, and indeed I think desirous, that they should be reconsidered with the consent of the other parties. I mean with the consent, so far as they were concerned, of the other parties.

Senator MOSES. Were all those treaties then produced, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Senator MOSES. Did that include the secret arrangement with reference to Avlona?

The PRESIDENT. I do not recall that agreement, Senator. You mean with regard to Italy having Avlona?

Senator MOSES. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. If it did, I did not see it. I heard of it, but I can not say confidently that the terms were laid before us.

Senator MOSES. I recall in some statements you made in connection with Fiume that you referred to Italy receiving Avlona under some agreement previously arrived at, and in that statement you held that to be part compensation at least for any loss she might sustain in not having Fiume.

The PRESIDENT. I was referring to what I understood to be the agreement. I am simply now answering your question that I did not see that agreement in written terms.

Senator MOSES. Then, they were not produced in textual form?

The PRESIDENT. I do not know; they may have been and I may not have picked them up in the great mass of papers before me.

Senator MOSES. The purpose of my inquiry was to ascertain whether there was laid before the council of ten any textual agreements which transferred parts of the territory of one independent nation to another.

The PRESIDENT. Only those that have been spoken of.

Senator MOSES. That is to say, Shantung and Avlona?

The PRESIDENT. I say only those that we have had under general discussion. I can not enumerate them, but there are none that have not been produced so far as I know. That answers the question.

Senator MCCUMBER. The secret treaties to which you refer are those treaties which were made from time to time as the exigencies of the war required during the period of the war?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator MCCUMBER. And not treaties that were made prior to the war?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask you a question in order to see if the facts are clear in my own mind. As I understand the situation—and I should like to have you correct me if I am wrong—France and Great Britain both have stated that they were bound by certain treaties with Japan and they were perfectly willing, with Japan's consent, to reconsider those treaties, but that they were themselves bound if the other party to the treaty did not consent to reconsider. Is that about it?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator WILLIAMS. That is what I thought. Bound in honor is the only way a nation is bound in international affairs.

Senator SWANSON. Can you tell us, or would it be proper to do so, of your understanding with Japan as to the return of Shantung? That is a question which has been very much discussed.

The PRESIDENT. I have published the wording of the understanding, Senator. I can not be confident that I quote it literally, but I know that I quote it in substance. It was that Japan should return to China in full sovereignty the old Province of Shantung so far as Germany had had any claims upon it, preserving to herself the right to establish a residential district at Tsingtao, which is the town of Kiaochow Bay; that with regard to the railways and mines she should retain only the rights of an economic concession there, with the right, however, to maintain a special body of police on the railway, the personnel of which should be Chinese under Japanese instructors nominated by the managers of the company and appointed by the Chinese Government. I think that is the whole of it.

Senator POMERENE. That is, that the instructors should be confirmed by the Chinese Government?

The PRESIDENT. No; not exactly that. The language, as I remember it, was that they should be nominated by the managers of the railway company, and appointed by the Chinese Government.

Senator BORAH. Was that understanding oral?

Senator WILLIAMS. This rather curious question presents itself to my mind: As I understand, Japan has retained sovereignty for the 99 years of the lease only at Kiaochow, and 5 kilometers, or some such distance, back from the bay.

The PRESIDENT. She has not retained sovereignty over anything.

Senator WILLIAMS. She has not?

The PRESIDENT. I mean, she has promised not to.

Senator WILLIAMS. During the period of the lease?

The PRESIDENT. No; she has promised not to retain sovereignty at all. Senator BORAH asked whether this understanding was oral or otherwise. I do not like to describe the operation exactly if it is not perfectly discreet, but as a matter of fact this was technically oral, but literally written and formulated, and the formulation agreed upon.

Senator JOHNSON of California. When, Mr. President, is the return to be made?

The PRESIDENT. That was left undecided, Senator, but we were assured at the time that it would be soon as possible.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did not the Japanese decline to fix any date?

The PRESIDENT. They did at that time, yes; but I think it is fair to them to say not in the spirit of those who wished it be within their choice, but simply that they could not at that time say when it would be.

Senator JOHNSON of California. The economic privileges that they would retain would give them a fair mastery over the Province, would they not, or at least the Chinese think so? Let me put it in that fashion, please.

The PRESIDENT. I believe they do, Senator. I do not feel qualified to judge. I should say that that was an exaggerated view.

Senator JOHNSON of California. But the Chinese feel that way about it, and have so expressed themselves?

The PRESIDENT. They have so expressed themselves.

Senator KNOX. Mr. President, the economic privileges that they originally acquired in Korea, and subsequently in inner and outer Mongolia, and in northern and southern Manchuria, have almost developed into a complete sovereignty over those countries, have they not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, Senator; in the absence of a league of nations they have.

Senator KNOX. You think the league of nations would have prevented that, do you?

The PRESIDENT. I am confident it would.

Senator NEW. Mr. President, does not this indefinite promise of Japan's suggest the somewhat analogous case of England's occupation of Malta? She has occupied Malta for something like a century, I believe, under a very similar promise.

The PRESIDENT. Well, Senator, I hope you will pardon me if I do not answer that question.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, speaking of the duty of defense in reference to sovereignty, and of aggression with reference to sovereignty, in construing these different articles of the league, I have been curious to know who will defend the mandate territories or colonies if there should be external aggression.

The PRESIDENT. Primarily, the mandatory power.

Senator FALL. The mandatory power would have that character of sovereignty over the possession which would compel it as a duty to defend the mandate province?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator FALL. Then a qualified sovereignty would in that instance, at any rate, compel the mandatory of the league first to defend the colony?

The PRESIDENT. I should put it this way, Senator: We had in mind throughout the whole discussion of the mandate idea the analogy of trustees. The States taking those under mandates would be in the nature of trustees, and of course it is part of the trustee's duty to preserve intact the trust estate?

Senator FALL. But out of the funds of the trust estate?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, I will not pursue that line at this time. I will say very frankly that I have prepared some questions which I wanted, for my own purposes, to put down in writing, and I had expected to ask them in sequence of you after the other Senators had concluded. It will, however, evidently take quite a long while if we pursue the line which we are now pursuing, and particularly if the Senators themselves argue their own interpretations of the different clauses in the treaty.

Senator McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to get as definite an understanding as I can, at least, of how these promises of Japan to return Shantung are evidenced to-day. In what form do they appear?

The PRESIDENT. They are evidenced in a procès-verbal of the so-called council of four—the name that we ourselves used was very much more pretentious; we called ourselves the council of the principal allied and associated powers—but the four who used to confer, or rather the five, because Japan was there of course at that time.

Senator McCUMBER. The principal points were taken down in writing and read over and compared and preserved, were they?

The PRESIDENT. Not read over and compared, but preserved. The process each day was this, Senator: The matters discussed were summarized, and the conclusions reached were recorded in a procès-verbal, copies of which were distributed within 24 hours; and of course it was open to any one of the conferees to correct anything they might contain. Only in that sense were they corrected.

Senator McCUMBER. Where are those records kept now?

The PRESIDENT. They are in Paris, sir.

Senator McCUMBER. Is there any objection to their being produced for the committee?

The PRESIDENT. I think there is a very serious objection, Senator. The reason we constituted that very small conference was so that we could speak with the utmost absence of restraint, and I think it would be a mistake to make use of those discussions outside. I do not remember any blazing indiscretion of my own, but there may be some.

Senator McCUMBER. In those conversations it was fully understood that Japan was to return Shantung as soon as possible?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator McCUMBER. Was there anything stated as to what was meant by "as soon as possible"—that is, to place it within any definite period at all?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; no. We relied on Japan's good faith in fulfilling that promise.

Senator McCUMBER. Was there anything outside? If I go too far in my question you can signify it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. How do you mean outside, Senator?

Senator McCUMBER. Was there anything said by Japan as to anything that she would want to do before she turned the territory over to China?

The PRESIDENT. No; nothing was mentioned.

Senator McCUMBER. Then, "as soon as possible" would naturally mean, would it not, as soon as the treaty has been signed under which she accepts the transfer from Germany?

The PRESIDENT. Well, I should say that it would mean that the process would begin then. Of course there would be many practical considerations of which I know nothing that might prolong the process.

Senator McCUMBER. And all that Japan reserves is the same that other great nations have reserved—certain concessions?

The PRESIDENT. A residential concession and economic concessions; yes, sir.

Senator McCUMBER. The same as Great Britain and France and other countries have retained there?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; and I ought to say that the representatives of Japan showed every evidence of wishing to put the matter upon just the same basis that the dealings of other nations with China have rested upon for some time.

Senator McCUMBER. The whole purpose of my question, Mr. President, is to satisfy my mind, if I can, that Japan will in good faith carry out her agreement.

The PRESIDENT. I have every confidence that she will, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may, I should like to ask a question or two along that same line. If this treaty should fail of ratification, then would not the opportunity be open to Japan to treat the Shantung question just as she has treated the Manchurian situation?

The PRESIDENT. I think so; yes.

Senator POMERENE. So that if the treaty should fail of ratification, China, so far as Shantung is concerned, would be practically at the mercy of Japan; whereas if the treaty is ratified, then at least she will have the benefit of the moral assistance of all the other signatory powers to the treaty to aid in the protection of Chinese rights?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I conceive one of the chief benefits of the whole arrangement that centers in the league of nations to be just what you have indicated—that it brings to bear the opinion of the world and the controlling action of the world on all relationships of that hazardous sort, particularly those relationships which involve the rights of the weaker nations. After all, the wars that are likely to come are most likely to come by aggression against the weaker nations. Without the league of nations they have no buttress or protection. With it, they have the united protection of the world; and inasmuch as it is the universal opinion that the great tragedy through which we have just passed never would have occurred if the Central Powers had dreamed that a number of nations would be combined against them, so I have the utmost confidence that this notice beforehand that the strong nations of the world will in every case be united will make war extremely unlikely.

Senator MOSES. Mr. President, are these procès-verbaux to be deposited anywhere as a matter of public record?

The PRESIDENT. That had not been decided, Senator. Of course, if they were deposited as a matter of public record, there would be certain very great disadvantages.

Senator MOSES. Are they to be deposited with the secretariat of the league of nations?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Senator MOSES. Without some such depository, how otherwise would this engagement of Japan, as embodied in the procès-verbal, be brought forward for enforcement?

The PRESIDENT. There would be as many copies of the procès-verbal as there were members of the conference in existence much longer than the time within which we shall learn whether Japan will fulfill her obligations or not.

Senator MOSES. You mean in the private papers of the personnel of the council of four?

The PRESIDENT. I would not call them private papers. I have a copy, Senator. I regard them as a public trust, not private papers, and I can assure you that they will not be destroyed.

Senator MOSES. Suppose that each member of the council of four had passed out of office, out of any position of power, at a time when it became evident that Japan was not keeping the engagement as it was embodied in the procès-verbal on the day when this record was made, in what manner would you expect that engagement to be brought forward for enforcement?

The PRESIDENT. I should deem it my duty—I can not speak for the others—to leave those papers where they could be made accessible.

Senator POMERENE. Mr. President, I have another question or two on the Shantung proposition that I should like to ask, if I may.

Assuming for the sake of the argument that there were to be some undue delay on the part of Japan in turning back to China her rights in Shantung, and that China were to make complaint to the council provided for in the league of nations, have you any doubt but that it would be taken up promptly by all the members of that council for their consideration and determination?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; I have not any doubt of it.

Senator POMERENE. Another question: On yesterday Dr. Millard was before the committee, and he made the statement that there were 20 regional understandings similar to the Monroe doctrine. I desire to say, however, that in answer to a question——

The PRESIDENT. Did he name any of them?

Senator POMERENE. I asked him some questions afterwards, and in explanation he qualified that statement by saying that these were written agreements somewhat akin to the Lansing-Ishii agreement, so-called, and as to these with relation to China a part of them were as between Japan and China, and a part as between Great Britain and China; and he instanced the secret agreement with Japan respecting Shantung. What I desired to ask was this: Did any information come to the commission indicating that there were any regional understandings similar to the Monroe doctrine?

The PRESIDENT. None, whatever. The only agreements that I can imagine he was referring to are contained in the exchanges of notes which occurred between the Japanese and Chinese Governments in 1915 and 1918 with regard to the method and conditions of the return of Shantung Province to China.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think it should be said also that later on in his testimony, either in answer to a question by Senator POMERENE, or perhaps in response to a question by Senator SWANSON, while the witness, Dr. Millard, stated that he deemed them regional understandings—those that he had in mind—he said very emphatically that they were totally unlike the Monroe doctrine, and would not come under that category.

The PRESIDENT. And in his sense every treaty that concerns territory anywhere affects a region, and is a regional understanding; but that is a very broad and vague meaning to attach to the word.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am quite hesitant about asking certain questions which I wish to ask. I apologize in advance for asking them, and I trust you will stop me at once if they are questions which you deem inappropriate, or that ought not to be asked.

The PRESIDENT. Thank you.

Senator JOHNSON of California. First, we have pending now treaties of peace with Austria, with Hungary, with Bulgaria, and with the Ottoman Empire, all of which involve tremendous new territorial adjustments; and under those new territorial adjustments we will have our obligations, moral or otherwise, under the league of nations, of course. The new territorial adjustments about to be determined upon in these various treaties are really greater in extent, or quite as important, at least, as those that are provided for by the German treaty; are they not?

The PRESIDENT. I should say so; yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. They will deal not only with the creation of the boundaries of new nations, but possibly with the subject of mandatories, too?

The PRESIDENT. Well, the treaties will not themselves deal with the mandatories. That is a matter that will be decided by the league.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDENT. But the treaties will no doubt create certain territories which fall under the trusteeship which will lead to mandatories.

Senator JOHNSON of California. So that there is a very important—in fact, the most important—part of the territorial world settlement yet to be made?

The PRESIDENT. Well, in extent, yes, Senator; so far as the amount of territory covered is concerned, yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Not only in extent, but in their character, and in the numbers of peoples involved, too, Mr. President. Is not that accurate?

The PRESIDENT. Well, you may be right, Senator; I do not know.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I think you answered to Senator BORAH the question I am about to ask, so pardon me if it is repetitive. It is this: Was the United States Government officially informed, at any time between the rupture of diplomatic relations with Germany and the signing of the armistice, of agreements made by the allied Governments in regard to the settlement of the war?

The PRESIDENT. No; not so far as I know.

Senator JOHNSON of California. So far as you are aware, was it unofficially informed during that period?

The PRESIDENT. I would be more clear in my answer, Senator, if I knew just what you were referring to.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I am referring to the so-called secret treaties which disposed of territory among the belligerents.

The PRESIDENT. You mean like the treaty of London?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; like the London pact.

The PRESIDENT. No; no, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Could you state whether or not any official investigation was made by our Government to ascertain whether or not there were any such treaties of territorial disposition?

The PRESIDENT. There was no such investigation.

Senator JOHNSON of California. These specific treaties, then—the treaty of London, on the basis of which Italy entered the war; the agreement with Roumania, in August, 1916; the various agreements in respect to Asia Minor and the agreements consummated in the winter of 1917 between France and Russia relative to the frontiers of Germany, and particularly in relation to the Saar Valley and the left bank of the Rhine—none of these did we (and when I say "we" I mean you, Mr. President) have any knowledge of prior to the conference at Paris?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. I can confidently answer that "No," in regard to myself.

Senator MCCUMBER. Senator JOHNSON, may I ask the President right here whether or not after we entered into the war any treaties were made between any of our cobelligerents that were not given to us?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; I do not know of any.

Senator MCCUMBER. Then the secret treaties that you have reference to were made prior to the time we entered into the war?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCUMBER. After that, our cobelligerents withheld nothing from us; did they?

The PRESIDENT. They entered into no agreements.

Senator BORAH. Well, you asked, Senator, if they withheld anything from us. They withheld all that they had had previously?

The PRESIDENT. No, no; but he means, Did they withhold any agreement that they made after we entered the war?

Senator MCCUMBER. That is just what I meant.

Senator JOHNSON of California. We do not know of any engagements which have been made subsequent to our entering into the war?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Those that I have referred to—and I say this, Senator, so that you will have no error in respect to it—I referred wholly, I think, to the treaties that were prior to our entry into the war.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Were you familiar, Mr. President, please, with any agreements that were made by the allied Governments with the Czecho-Slovak National Council, the Polish National Council, and the Jugo-Slav National Committee?

The PRESIDENT. I was aware of arrangements similar to those that we had ourselves made recognizing those national committees as provisional representatives of the people.

Senator JOHNSON of California. But merely as recognizing governments, and that these committees represented the peoples of the various countries?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; and the recognition was purely informal. It was not an international recognition, but an agreement to deal with them as representatives.

Senator JOHNSON of California. When our Government through you, Mr. President, in January, 1918, made the 14 points as the basis for peace, were those points made with the knowledge of the existence of the secret agreements?

The PRESIDENT. No; oh, no.

Senator JOHNSON of California. It was not intended, then, by the expression of these 14 points, to supplant the aims contained in the secret treaties?

The PRESIDENT. Since I knew nothing of them, necessarily not.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; quite so. Do you know, Mr. President, or is it permissible for us to be told, whether France has special military agreements with Poland and Czecho-Slovakia?

The PRESIDENT. I know of none, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did China enter the war upon our advice—the advice of the United States?

The PRESIDENT. I can not tell, sir. We advised her to enter, and she soon after did. She had sought our advice. Whether that was the persuasive advice or not, I do not know.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you recall, Mr. President, that preceding that advice we had asked China, as one of the neutral nations, to sever diplomatic relations with Germany?

The PRESIDENT. Whether we had asked her?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. I do not recall, Senator. I am sure Mr. Lansing can tell, though, from the records of the department.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you know, Mr. President, whether or not our Government stated to China that if China would enter the war we would protect her interests at the peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. We made no promises.

Senator JOHNSON of California. No representations of that sort?

The PRESIDENT. No. She knew that we would as well as we could. She had every reason to know that.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Pardon me a further question: You did make the attempt to do it, too; did you not?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, indeed I did; very seriously.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And the decision ultimately reached at the peace conference was a disappointment to you?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; I may frankly say that it was.

Senator JOHNSON of California. You would have preferred, as I think most of us would, that there had been a different conclusion of the Shantung provision, or the Shantung difficulty or controversy, at the Paris peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; I frankly intimated that.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did it require the unanimous consent of the members of the peace conference to reach a decision like the Shantung decision?

The PRESIDENT. Every decision; yes, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you recall, Mr. President, prior to the decision on the territorial question of Shantung, or of German rights in Shantung, the racial equality question coming before the peace conference?

The PRESIDENT. I remember that at one of the sessions called plenary sessions a resolution regarding that matter was introduced by the Japanese representatives, but rather as an expression of opinion or hope, and it was not pressed for action.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the press at that time stated that it had gone to a vote—and I trust some one will correct me if I am in error—and that the vote was 11 to 6 upon the proposition. The dispatches at that time were to that effect.

The PRESIDENT. I was misled, Senator. You are referring to the commission on a league of nations?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. There was a vote there. There never was a vote on any subject in the peace conference.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I confounded the two.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. May I ask, if permissible, how the representatives of the United States voted upon that particular proposition?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I think it is very natural you should ask that. I am not sure that I am at liberty to answer, because that touches the intimacy of a great many controversies that occurred in that conference, and I think it is best, in the interest of international good understanding, that I should not answer.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you know, Mr. President, whether or not the American commission at Paris urged that a definite sum of reparation be fixed in the treaty?

The PRESIDENT. It did.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Will you state, if appropriate, why that view did not prevail?

The PRESIDENT. No, Senator, I can not; and yet I dislike to decline, because it may create a misapprehension on your part. Let me see if I can explain it, without indiscretion: I would be very glad, gentlemen, to tell you all about it, if you will leave it out of the notes. May I do that?—because I do not wish to leave any wrong impression on your minds. The explanation is perfectly simple.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is the question, please?

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Why was the policy urged by the United States, that we fix a definite sum of reparation in the treaty, not adopted?

Senator BORAH. I would be content to have it left out of the notes upon your request; but I am afraid it would still get to the public, and that would put us in an embarrassing position.

The PRESIDENT. It is not an explanation discreditable to anybody, but it is an international secret. I am quite at liberty to say that the United States financial representatives—who, by the way, made an admirable impression upon everybody over there—did advocate the fixing of a definite sum for reparation.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, may I ask, to clear up a difficulty in my own mind, whether you regard the answering of these questions as an indiscretion because of the fact that there are other negotiations pending which might be affected?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, no, sir; simply because they affect the internal political affairs of other countries.

Senator FALL. Then, in your judgment, these matters should never be given publicity?

The PRESIDENT. Matters of this sort.

Senator FALL. I say, matters of this sort that have been referred to, should, in your judgment, never be given publicity; and it is not because of pending or other negotiations?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, no; I think they should not be given publicity.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I thank you very much, Mr. President. That is all I desire to ask.

The PRESIDENT. You have been very considerate in putting your questions.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, as I suggested, I have prepared several written questions, for the purpose of concentrating my own ideas, and several of them, I may say, are somewhat in sequence, and I feel that if we are going to hold hearings all day—that is, if we are all going to have the time and do not get into arguments among ourselves—possibly it might be just to you to submit these questions, as I have prepared them, to you first, and allow you to look them over before I pursue the line of inquiry. However, that is, of course, entirely with you. They do not all refer directly to provisions of the treaty nor to the construction of the treaty, but to other matters relating to the treaty.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Before you do that, Senator, with the President's permission may I ask one or two more questions concerning Shantung which I omitted or forgot?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly, Senator.

Senator JOHNSON of California. First, did Japan decline to sign the award as made or provided in the peace treaty?

The PRESIDENT. Her representatives informed us, Senator, that they were instructed not to sign in that event.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Was the determination finally reached a balancing of the difficulties or the disadvantages that might arise because of the balancing of those advantages or disadvantages?

The PRESIDENT. I do not know that I could answer that either "yes" or "no," Senator. It was a matter of many conversations and of many arguments and persuasions.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Was the decision reached—if you will pardon the perfectly blunt question—because Japan declined to sign unless that decision was reached in that way?

The PRESIDENT. No; I do not think it would be true to say "yes" to that question. It was reached because we thought it was the best that could be got, in view of the definite engagements of Great Britain and France, and the necessity of a unanimous decision, which we held to be necessary in every case we have decided.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Great Britain and France adhered to their original engagements, did they not?

The PRESIDENT. They said that they did not feel at liberty to disregard them.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And you, Mr. President, were the one who was endeavoring to determine—I gather this from the news dispatches—the question upon its merits and its justice.

The PRESIDENT. Our Government was the only Government free under the circumstances; yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir. Do you mind stating, or would you prefer not, what it was that caused you ultimately to accede to the decision that was demanded by Japan?

The PRESIDENT. Only the conclusion that I thought that it was the best that could be got under the circumstances.

Senator BRANDEGEE. May I interpolate there without disturbing you, Senator JOHNSON?

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. In Part 6 of the hearings before our committee, on page 182, Senator JOHNSON of California questioned Secretary Lansing. [Reading:]

> Senator JOHNSON of California. Was the Shantung decision made in order to have the Japanese signatures to the league of nations?
> Secretary LANSING. That I can not say.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. In your opinion, was it?
> Secretary LANSING. I would not want to say that, because I really have not the facts on which to form an opinion along that line.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. Would the Japanese signatures to the league of nations have been obtained if you had not made the Shantung agreement?
> Secretary LANSING. I think so.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. You do?
> Secretary LANSING. I think so.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. So that even though Shantung had not been delivered to Japan, the league of nations would not have been injured?
> Secretary LANSING. I do not think so.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. And you would have had the same signatories that you have now?
> Secretary LANSING. Yes; one more, China.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. One more, China. So that the result of the Shantung decision was simply to lose China's signature rather than to gain Japan's?
> Secretary LANSING. That is my personal view, but I may be wrong about it.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. Why did you yield on a question on which you thought you ought not to yield and that you thought was a principle?
> Secretary LANSING. Because naturally we were subject to the direction of the President of the United States.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. And it was solely because you felt that you were subject to the decision of the President of the United States that you yielded?
> Secretary LANSING. Yes.
> Senator JOHNSON of California. The decision is his?
> Secretary LANSING. Necessarily.

Now, I wondered whether Secretary Lansing was well informed about this question or not?

The PRESIDENT. Well, my conclusion is different from his, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You could not have got the signature of Japan if you had not given Shantung to Japan?

The PRESIDENT. That is my judgment.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You say you were notified to that effect?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator SWANSON. As I understand, you were notified that they had instructions not to sign unless this was included.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BORAH. And was it your judgment that after the treaty had been ratified, China's rights would be protected and Japan would surrender to China what she said she would?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator SWANSON. As I understand it, you consider this verbal agreement effective as relating to Shantung and you understood that this conveyance would be followed by a conveyance to China.

The PRESIDENT. Not to supersede it, but the action by Japan is to follow.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I beg your pardon, what was your question?

Senator SWANSON. The conveyance or retransfer of the German possessions in Shantung is to be followed by Japan's conveyance of this back to China, according to this agreement. One is as effective as the other.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Yes; but, Mr. President, you would have much preferred to have a different disposition, notwithstanding the promise of Japan, in the treaty, would you not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL, would this be a practical suggestion? I have no objection to sitting here all day. Indeed, I have taken the liberty of having lunch prepared, if the gentlemen of the committee would be kind enough to join me. But since your questions are written, perhaps you might leave them with me and let me give such answers as I feel I can.

Senator FALL. Precisely, Mr. President. I can say to you, sir, that I prepared the questions with some care for the purpose of informing myself, and I think that it might not be entirely fair to you to answer offhand a series of questions, when I have the theory in mind along which I am propounding the questions—that is, one may lead to another—and I think it would be only fair to you that you might have the questions so you can read them and follow it.

The PRESIDENT. Will you state the theory at the top? [Laughter.]

Senator FALL. There are two or three theories. The first question that I would like to ask is, "In your judgment have you not the authority by proclamation to declare in words that peace exists, and thus restore the status of peace between the Government and the people of this country and those with whom we declared war?" If you choose, I will read the following question.

The PRESIDENT. That sets the key to them, I suppose.

Senator FALL. To several of them. Then there are others along other lines, one of which leads to another.

The PRESIDENT. I would be happy to answer them as far as I can.

Senator FALL. That can be done later or now, just as you please.

Senator WILLIAMS. Suppose we take a recess.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know whether there are any more questions.

The PRESIDENT. I had thought that I would send you in the replies.

Senator FALL. That would certainly be satisfactory to me. You would have no objection to the same publicity that is being given now?

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator FALL. There are two or three different lines of questions.

Senator MCCUMBER. You would probably get more clear information if you take that method.

Senator FALL. I think so. They are not in any sense, Mr. President, prepared as catch questions, otherwise I would not submit them to you. If you were on the stand, and I were cross-examining you as a witness, I would prefer not to let you see the whole series of questions. But I think that is fair, and so far as I am concerned if it is satisfactory to you it would be more satisfactory to me.

Senator BRANDEGEE. In reply to Senator LODGE's inquiry I jotted down a few questions at random with the idea of asking some if they had not been touched upon by other members of the committee. I have some that I would like to ask, but I want to conform to the convenience of the President and the committee as to when it shall be done. I do not mean to delay you on your luncheon hour or anything of that kind.

The PRESIDENT. The luncheon hour is 1 o'clock, and I was in hopes that you gentlemen would remain for lunch.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not want to absorb the remaining time if other Senators want to go on now. I am perfectly willing to wait until they are finished.

Senator HARDING. I would like to hear your questions.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I am not sure what questions I will ask except I made some notes.

Senator WILLIAMS. I would rather come back to-morrow morning at half-past 10.

Senator HITCHCOCK. We have an engagement to-morrow morning for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we must have some consideration for the President's time.

Senator HARDING. I just want to reserve one question.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you not want to ask it now?

The CHAIRMAN. We have until 1 o'clock.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have here the President's statement which he read to us when we met here this morning, and in it he states:

> Nothing, I am led to believe, stands in the way of the ratification of the treaty except certain doubts with regard to the meaning and implication of certain articles of the covenant of the league of nations; and I must frankly say that I am unable to understand why such doubts should be entertained.

Now, I do not believe the President is correctly informed as to the situation if he believes that. There are things in the treaty itself which militate against the ratification, in my opinion, of the treaty without amendment. Did you have in mind, Mr. President, when you read that to us, the Shantung provision of the treaty?

The PRESIDENT. I certainly had that in mind, Senator, but I did not understand that that stood in the way of ratification. I am, of course, acting only upon such information as I have received.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I understand—and that is the reason of taking the liberty of suggesting to you that you may not be well informed in this respect. Of course there is opposition by a great many Senators to the entire covenant of the league of nations, which I have no doubt you know, that is, article 1 of the treaty of Versailles. Then there is opposition to the various parts of the covenants of the league and not to the whole league, by other Senators. Then there is a great opposition, fundamental and sincere, to the Shantung provision, which is in the body of the treaty itself, and which can only be cured by an amendment. As I understand it, no reservation that we could make in the resolution of ratification would be effective to strike out the Shantung provision. It must be cured, if it is cured, by a straight out-and-out amendment, striking that from the treaty. That, of course, would necessitate the resubmission of the treaty to the signatories who have already signed it.

Now, you state later on that every suggestion of the United States was accepted, that is after you went back, after you had your conference with us last March, and having obtained our views as to the necessity for certain changes in the first draft of the covenant, you state [reading]:

> The view of the United States with regard to the questions I have mentioned had, in fact, already been accepted by the commission and there was supposed to be nothing inconsistent with them in the draft of the covenent first adopted.

And omitting a few lines which do not apply to that you say [reading]:

> There was absolutely no doubt as to the meaning of any one of the resulting provisions of the covenant in the minds of those who participated in drafting them, and I respectfully submit that there is nothing vague or doubtful in their wording.

Of course that is your opinion, if I may say so.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But you are familiar with the statements, I have no doubt, that ex-Senator Root, Chief Justice Hughes, Mr. Taft, and other able lawyers of the country have made with respect to the necessity for reservations if we are to ratify the treaty, are you not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is, you admit that there are grave doubts among the ablest lawyers of the country as to the necessity for reservations or the alternative between reservations and ratifying the whole treaty, as it is expressed in the vernacular, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

The PRESIDENT. I admit that there are those difficulties in a great many minds.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now, of course, it is true, is it not, that if difficulties arise as to the construction of any provision of the treaty after we have passed from the scene, what we thought the provisions of the treaty or of the covenant meant, will not be very powerful in the construction that may be placed upon it by those who then have to determine what it means, will it?

The PRESIDENT. The vote of the United States will be essential.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not mean that. The fact that you think now that everything in the treaty is plain and that there is no doubt about the meaning of any provisions, and the fact that I think there is grave doubt about many of the provisions, will not seriously affect the opinion of the council or of the arbitrator that finally passes upon the true meaning of the treaty when dispute arises.

The PRESIDENT. No, Senator; but the plain wording of the treaty will have a great deal to do, and the meaning of the wording is plain.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is simply another way of stating, is it not, that you are clear in your opinion that the provisions of the treaty are plain? But I am suggesting that there will be a dispute between nations as to what the treaty means after we have passed from the scene.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; it is a question of being confident of what language means, not confident of an opinion.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I mean, we derive our opinions as to the meanings of the treaty from the language of the treaty, do we not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now they would derive their construction of what the treaty means from the language of it, we not being there?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. So that what we think about it now will not be determinative in an international court or before an arbitrator 20 years hence in case of a dispute between two nations as to the meaning of the treaty?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly not, but the language will.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of course they will have the language before them, but the language which determines it is now in dispute between you and certain lawyers of the country and certain Senators as to its meaning. Now what provision is there in the treaty for the determination of a dispute as to the interpretation of a clause of the treaty if such dispute arises?

The PRESIDENT. The covenant states that there are certain questions which are acknowledged as being especially suitable for submission to arbitration. One of those is the meaning of the treaty.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What does the treaty provide about that?

The PRESIDENT. You have it there, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes, sir; I wondered if you remembered it.

The PRESIDENT. I think I do so, but you have the language.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes. Article 12 of the league provides [reading]:

> The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

That is, if there is a dispute, as I construe this, between members of the league as to the meaning of the covenant or any article thereof, it shall be referred to the arbitrators.

The PRESIDENT. Only if the parties agree.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Or to the council?

The PRESIDENT. Or to the council; yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is, the council is to determine the meaning of the covenant?

The PRESIDENT. No, Senator; I beg your pardon. There are two processes. If the parties agree to submit to arbitration, of course it is submitted to arbitration, and the decision is final. If they think it is a question that they are not willing to submit to arbitration, then they must submit it to the council for an expression of opinion and a recommendation, but that opinion and recommendation do not bind.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is there any possible way authoritatively of determining without war what the treaty means?

The PRESIDENT. That is true of every treaty, Senator. If you re-express it in the language of the Senators to whom you refer and there is a dispute about the meaning of that, the same would apply. You can not use any language, I assume, which could not possibly give rise to some sort of dispute.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I assume that if it provided that if there should arise between the members of the league any dispute in relation to the construction of any article of the covenant of the league of nations, such dispute should be referred to an arbitrator, and the members would agree to be bound by its decision; that would be an agreement for an authoritative determination of what the treaty meant.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now, as it is they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and so forth. Now, you say that the opinion of the council to which the dispute has been submitted is only advisory?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Then suppose one party to the dispute against whom the council decides declines to abide by it?

The PRESIDENT. Then there is war, but not within three months of the opinion of the council.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Under article 10 the members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. That is a contract between the signatories. We say: "We undertake to preserve the territorial integrity of the members against external aggression," which means that we contract to do it, does it not?

The PRESIDENT. We engage to do it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It means an international contract, does it not, a compact, an agreement?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Whether that is a moral or legal obligation, it is an obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of course, it is a moral duty to keep a promise, and this is an international promise; so that the distinction between a moral obligation and a legal one seems to me to be not of great importance, because we are obligated in any event.

The PRESIDENT. Pardon me; I think it is of the greatest importance, because the element of judgment enters into it as it does not in the other.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You mean the judgment as to whether or not it is a moral obligation?

The PRESIDENT. No. For example, a question is submitted to arbitration and it is agreed that the decision shall be final. The judgment of one of the parties to the controversy may be that the decision is a very bad one, but it has to accept it; the element of judgment is excluded altogether; but, with regard to the method of fulfilling the obligations of a covenant like that under consideration there is freedom of judgment on the part of the individual members of the league. It seems to me that makes a very considerable difference.

Senator HARDING. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt right there?

Senator BRANDEGEE. I will.

Senator HARDING. I dislike to interrupt the Senator.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Senator HARDING. The President expressed awhile ago surprise that I raised a question as to the value of this compact because of the moral obligation feature. Let me premise by the statement that I look upon a moral obligation as that which the conscience of the contracting party impels. The conscience of any nation in Europe, for example, may be warped by its prejudices, racial, geographical, and otherwise. If that be true and any nation may put aside or exercise its judgment as to the moral obligation in accepting any recommendation of the league, really what do we get out of this international compact in the enforcement of any decree?

The PRESIDENT. We get the centering upon it generally of the definite opinion of the world, expressed through the authoritative organs of the responsible governments.

Senator HARDING. Another question: That is surrendering the suggestion of a moral obligation for this Republic to the prejudices or necessities of the nations of the Old World, is it not?

The PRESIDENT. I do not understand that we make such a surrender.

Senator HARDING. Would you not understand a decree by the council to be a suggestion of this moral obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly I would, but we would have to concur in that before it had any force of any kind.

Senator HARDING. Would it not be quite as moral for this Republic itself to determine its moral obligations?

The PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly, Senator; but in the meantime the world would not have the knowledge before it that there will be concerted action by all the responsible governments of the world in the protection of the peace of the world. The minute you do away with that assurance to the world you have reached the situation which produced the German war.

Senator HARDING. What becomes of our standing among nations if the council fixes a moral obligation upon us and we reject the judgment of the council as to the moral obligation?

The PRESIDENT. Pardon me if I remind you that we always have to concur in that.

Senator HARDING. Precisely; but the council state what constitutes the moral obligation, if we agree; but if we do not agree, then, in the eyes of the world we have rejected its judgment as to a moral obligation.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; and I hold that we are at liberty to do that, if our moral judgment honestly differs from the moral judgment of the world.

Senator HARDING. Then, let us go back to the original inquiry. What permanent value is there, then, to this compact?

The PRESIDENT. The greatest permanent value, Senator, is the point that I have raised. We are assuming that the United States will not concur in the general moral judgment of the world. In my opinion, she generally will. If it had been known that this war was coming on, her moral judgment would have concurred with that of the other Governments of the world, with that of the other peoples of the world; and if Germany had known that there was a possibility of that sort of concurrence, she never would have dared to do what she did. Without such notice served on the powers that may wish to repeat the folly that Germany commenced, there is no assurance to the world that there will be peace even for a generation, whereas if they know beforehand that there will be that concert of judgment, there is the most tremendous guaranty.

Senator HARDING. But, Mr. President, nobody expressed for us our moral obligation to enter into this war. That was our own expression, was it not?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; it was our concurrence in the judgment of the world.

Senator HARDING. One of the points I am getting at, if I can make it clear, is the necessity of a written compact for this Republic to fulfill its moral obligations to civilization.

The PRESIDENT. Senator, this Republic, if I interpret it rightly, does not need a suggestion from any quarter to fulfill its moral obligations.

Senator HARDING. I quite agree with that.

The PRESIDENT. But it steadies the whole world by its promise beforehand that it will stand with other nations of similar judgment to maintain right in the world.

Senator FALL. Mr. President, then if the commissioner of the United States on the council were to join with the other members of the council in fixing a moral obligation upon the United States, and the Congress and the President, acting as part of the legislative branch of the Government, were to reject that judgment, would it not have a very disastrous effect upon the league, throw the world into chaos, and undo all that has been done?

The PRESIDENT. It might; but you are assuming a case——

Senator FALL. Certainly; we have to assume cases.

The PRESIDENT. Where we would have to assume that responsibility, because, being part of the Government, we would in every case really express the judgment of the American people, and if the unhappy time should ever come when that judgment is against the judgment of the rest of the world we would have to express it.

Senator FALL. Certainly, Mr. President, I am possibly looking, as Bacon said, at a distance.

Senator MCCUMBER. Would our moral conviction of the unrighteousness of the German war have brought us into this war if Germany had not committed any acts against us, without the league of nations, as, of course, we had no league of nations at that time?

The PRESIDENT. I hope it would eventually, Senator, as things developed.

Senator MCCUMBER. Do you think if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens that we would have gotten into this war?

The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

Senator MCCUMBER. You think we would have gotten in anyway?

The PRESIDENT. I do.

Senator BRANDEGEE. If I may be allowed to resume, for I kept still all morning——

Senator FALL. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I am going to ask the President to excuse me, as I have an engagement.

The PRESIDENT. I am sorry, Senator, that you are obliged to leave.

Senator FALL. I regret, sir, that I have an engagement with my wife, who is not in very good health.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now, if I may proceed without interruption, which breaks the continuity of my thought and uses a great deal of time, I will be through in a very few minutes. As I understand the President, his construction of article 10 is that if the council considers the question of external aggression upon a member of the league, we, having signed this treaty with article 10 in it, in which we undertake to preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity of all members of the league, can then say, it is a moral question into which the element of judgment enters and we, considering our judgment binding at the time, do not care to agree to the recommendation of the council. If every member of the league is at liberty to take that view of its moral and legal obligations under article 10, and declines to do what the council recommends, and if it is known in advance that that is the construction placed upon article 10 by those who framed it, it does not seem to me—and this is merely my opinion—that the terror to wrongdoers by what is hoped to be the united, concerted action of the members of the league in the concentration of its powers to suppress the wrongdoer will have the effect that the President thinks it will. In other words, I do not think that Germany would have refrained from war if she had known that article 10 was in existence.

Article 10 says:

> In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

There is no doubt that that is an obligation in a contract, and I know of but one way to perform an obligation that you have contracted to perform, and that is to perform it. I do not think that it admits of any qualifications after you sign the treaty. I want to call attention also to the fact that the external aggression which we undertake, if we sign this treaty, to repel or guarantee against is not stated in the treaty at all to be an unwarranted aggression. I wish to ask the President if the league were in existence and Hungary and Roumania were members of it, and Roumania were in the position she now is, having raided the territorial integrity of Hungary and marched through its capital and occupied it, and the council, as its duty would be under the covenant, considered what was best to be done and advised us to send immediately to cooperate with them 100,000 men, whether we would be at liberty to discuss whether we were morally bound by article 10 of the covenant and decline to send the men, and, if we were, could we do it without risking being called an "international slacker" by the other members of the league?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, since you have made the case a concrete one I am afraid I ought not to answer it, because it involves a judgment as between Roumania and Hungary.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I withdraw the names of the two countries, and assume the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT. Let me say that I take it for granted that in practically every case the United States would respond; but that does not seem to be the question. I quite agree with you that a moral obligation is to be fulfilled, and I am confident that our Nation will fulfill it, but that does not remove from each individual case the element of judgment which we are free to exercise in two stages: We are, first, free to exercise it in the vote of our representative on the council, who will of course act under instructions from the home Government; and, in the second place, we are to exercise it when the President, acting upon the action of the council, makes his recommendation to Congress. Then, Congress is to exercise its judgment as to whether or not the instructions of the Executive to our member of the council were well-founded, and whether the case is one of distinct moral obligation.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Suppose that each member of the council, as you say, acting under instructions from its home Government, including our representative on the council, should think, for instance, that Roumania was entirely right in some invasion of Hungary, and public sentiment was that way, but that our Government instructed our representative to vote with the foreign members of the council to support Hungary—suppose the public sentiment of the other members and of the people of this country were in favor of Roumania, what sort of a position would we be in to fulfill our guaranty?

The PRESIDENT. In order to answer that question I must go a little bit afield. In the first place, I understand that article to mean that no nation is at liberty to invade the territorial integrity of another. That does not mean to invade for purposes of warfare, but to impair the territorial integrity of another nation. Its territorial integrity is not destroyed by armed intervention; it is destroyed by the retention of territory, by taking territory away from it; that impairs its territorial integrity. I understand the covenant to mean that that is in no case permissible by the action of a single nation against another; that there is only one permissible method and that is, if territorial arrangements are unsatisfactory, that they should be brought to the attention of the world through the league and that then the league should exercise such rights as it may be able to exercise for a readjustment of boundaries.

I believe that territorial aggression, in the sense of territorial capture, is, by the wording of the act, made illegitimate.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The words are not "territorial aggression," but "external aggression."

The PRESIDENT. But it says the preservation of its territorial integrity against external aggression.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Suppose the external aggressor, having gotten within the territory of the aggressee, stays there?

The PRESIDENT. Then that impairs the territorial integrity.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Certainly; and then on a call by the council for us to perform our international contract under article 10, if Congress does not favor performing it you think we would not be subject to criticism by the other members of the league?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, we might be subject to criticism; but I think Congress would be at liberty to form its own judgment as to the circumstances.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I agree with you entirely, and under our Constitution Congress would have to do so.

The PRESIDENT. Yes; that is understood by all.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of course; but I am assuming if the council should advise us to do a certain thing, and Congress refused to do it, and if every nation's representative assembly can do the same thing, it seems to me like a rope of sand and not an effective tribunal which would result in promoting peace.

The PRESIDENT. The reason I do not agree with you, Senator, is that I do not think such a refusal would likely often occur. I believe it would be only upon the gravest grounds—and in case Congress is right, I am indifferent to foreign criticism.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of course, we would always think we were right, I assume. Now, I wish to call your attention to article 15. I do this simply because you think all these provisions are clear, and I want to say in that connection that we had Mr. Miller, who described himself as the technical expert or adviser to the American Peace Commission, especially, I think, on questions of international law.

The PRESIDENT. The League of Nations.

Senator BRANDEGEE. We had him before our committee, and he answered this question, that I am about to ask, in three different ways and we could not, of course, get much information from him; and he promised to take it under advisement and to give us his considered opinion, but he has not done so. Now, article 15, in the last two paragraphs provides:

> The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.
> In any case referred to the assembly, all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

Now, in the first place, it says "represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league." Does that mean that the various members of the league have got to act upon that as separate Governments, or does it mean the representatives of the other members of the league?

The PRESIDENT. I do not quite understand that question.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It says:

> A report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league.

Does that mean there "and a majority of the other representatives of members of the league in the assembly"?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; I assume so.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But it does not say so. It leaves it as though the members of the league could act independently of their representatives and the assembly.

The PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I assume it means what you say.

The PRESIDENT. Yes; I assume that.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Very well. Now, the question: Supposing there were a dispute between the United States and that portion of the British Empire known as the United Kingdom—England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales—as to some right of one of our ships to enter an English port, for instance, and that dispute should come before the council, and, upon the request of Great Britain, it should be removed to the assembly. The article I have just read provides for a report concurred in "exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute."

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Now, all the self-governing colonies of England, or at least five of them, have a vote in the assembly, and the British Empire also has a vote. I assume in the case of the dispute which I have supposed, of course, the United States would be excluded from voting, as being a party to the dispute; and I assume the British Empire would be excluded, but I am not sure.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; that is what I assume.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you assume also that Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and India would be excluded?

The PRESIDENT. They are parts of the British Empire.

Senator BRANDEGEE. They are parts of the British Empire, but are they parties to the dispute which I have supposed to have arisen between us and England?

The PRESIDENT. I admit, Senator, that that is a complicated question; but my judgment about it is quite clear. I think I can give one instead of three answers.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. Disputes can arise only through the Governments which have international representation. In other words, diplomatically speaking, there is only one "British Empire." The parts of it are but pieces of the whole. The dispute, therefore, in the case you have supposed, would be between the United States as a diplomatic unit and the British Empire as a diplomatic unit. That is the only ground upon which the two nations could deal with one another, whether by way of dispute or agreement. Therefore, I have assumed, and confidently assumed, that the representatives of all parts of the British Empire would be excluded.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I should think that would be only fair, and I would assume that; but Mr. Miller answered that question by saying first that he was in doubt; secondly, that the self-governing colonies of Great Britain or of the British Empire would not be excluded, because they were not parties to the dispute; and then, third, that they would be excluded because they were parts of the British Empire; and if the legal adviser of the commission was that much confused, I feel that I need not apologize for being confused myself.

The PRESIDENT. No; but the commission was not confused.

Senator KNOX. May I say this: I was not present at the meeting when Mr. Miller testified. The fact is that while it is technically true, as the President says, that the British self-governing colonies deal diplomatically through the British foreign office, it is only true in a most technical sense. They are absolutely autonomous, even in their diplomatic dealings, as to matters that affect them. For instance, I remember when the Canadian reciprocity agreement was negotiated in 1911, the delegates sent to negotiate the agreement were from Canada. Great Britain did not appear at the hearings or conferences at all, and in every sense Canada was just as autonomous in conducting her international negotiations as she would have been if she had been an absolutely independent government.

The PRESIDENT. Yes; but this, you see, Senator, is a combination of definite Governments that have definite international relations with each other.

Senator KNOX. But the fact that you give representation to Canada and Australia and New Zealand and other autonomous self-governing British colonies rather contradicts the idea, does it not, that they are one Government?

The PRESIDENT. I think not, sir; because in making up the constitution of the council it was provided, to speak with technical accuracy, that the five principal allied or associated Governments should each have one representative in the league; and in the opening paragraph of the treaty itself those powers are enumerated, and among others is the British Empire. "The Empire of Great Britain," I think, is the technical term. Therefore, their unity is established by their representation in the council.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I read from the treaty——

The CHAIRMAN. I was going to ask, if I may, what function do these five dominions of the British Empire have in the assembly?

The PRESIDENT. None, except the general powers of the assembly itself.

The CHAIRMAN. They have votes in the assembly?

The PRESIDENT. They have votes, but in a matter involving the British Empire, they would have but one vote among them.

The CHAIRMAN. But on all other matters, they would each have one vote?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I want to call the President's attention to the first page of the treaty with Germany, which says, after the preamble setting forth the desirability of the condition existing being replaced by a just and durable peace, "For this purpose, the high contracting parties represented as follows," and then it names them, and in the list is "His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, by his duly accredited officials, and the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of South Africa, the Dominion of New Zealand," etc. Now, they are "high contracting parties"?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And if one of those high contracting parties has a dispute with another of the high contracting parties, by what inference are other high contracting parties made parties to the dispute?

The PRESIDENT. I think by the inference that I thought I established, sir——

Senator BRANDEGEE. But, if you will allow me to say so, it does not say that these parties, the self-governing British colonies, shall be excluded from participating in the deliberations because they may have some interest in the controversy.

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator BRANDEGEE. They must be parties to the dispute. Now, if we have a dispute with England about the right of an American ship to enter an English port, how can it be said that New Zealand or Australia is a party to that dispute?

The PRESIDENT. Because, Senator, in case of the worst coming to the worst, and war ensuing, we would be at war with all of them.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It may be that a blunder has been made in creating such a situation. It would not be determinative, in my opinion.

Now, on page 7 of the print that I have, which is Senate Document No. 49, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, the last thing in the treaty is this statement:

> From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this treaty, official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the allied and associated powers.

The treaty itself provides that when Germany and three of the allied and associated powers have ratified the treaty it has come into force.

The PRESIDENT. As between those parties.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It does not say so.

The PRESIDENT. I beg your pardon, I think it does.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Here it is, Mr. President. [Handing pamphlet to the President.] I have read it, and there is no such language in it that I can discover.

The PRESIDENT. No; not the part that you read; I did not mean that; but in the part where the provision is referred to about ratification by Germany and three of the principal allied and associated powers.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have read that with some care, and I have not seen it.

Senator KNOX. The language to which the President refers is the concluding paragraph of the treaty, and it provides that when the process of ratification shall have been completed by Germany and any three powers, the treaty shall come into force.

The PRESIDENT. As between them.

Senator KNOX. No; I beg your pardon, Mr. President. In a subsequent clause dealing with what I think is an entirely different matter—that is, the adjustments as between the nations, not adjustments as between the allied and associated powers and Germany—it comes into force whenever the ratifications are made; but if you will take the body of the treaty you will find that everything that Germany is to do is to be done within a certain number of days after the ratification has been made; and a certain number of months afterwards she is to demobilize, give up her ships, and do all things that will make her practically a noncombatant, within a number of days after ratification by three of the powers; so she is either at peace with the world, or she is only partially at peace with the world; and as the requirements of the treaty are specific that she is to go out of the war business altogether, there is a conclusive inference in my mind that she is at peace with the world when those three ratifications have been made.

The PRESIDENT. I can not agree with you there. You see, the theory is this: That when three of the principal allied and associated powers ratify this treaty, Germany having ratified it, then the treaty is in force; that is to say, she has then engaged to do the things provided in the treaty, and her engagement is with those three powers, among the rest, and she must then proceed to do what she has promised; but it does not establish peace between her and other countries.

Senator KNOX. I think that language shows that it establishes peace and provides for a resumption of diplomatic and all other relations with Germany. I intend, within a short time, to try to make my views upon that clear.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I went into that question rather thoroughly—"from the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate." Then it says, "From that moment, and subject to the provisions of this treaty, official relations with Germany and with any of the German States will be resumed by the allied and associated powers," which I assume means all of them.

Now, to revert to another point, Mr. President, have you any knowledge—and I ask all these questions, of course, subject to your determination as to whether it is proper for you to answer them, or to make any statement about them——

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Are the Austrian, Bulgarian, and Turkish treaties, which I assume are in process of being made——

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE (continuing). Intertwined with the covenant of the league of nations as is the treaty with Germany?

The PRESIDENT. The covenant of the league constitutes a part of each of those treaties.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Would you feel at liberty to state what percentage of progress they have made up to the present time, or how nearly completed they are?

The PRESIDENT. I think they are all practically completed, Senator, with the exception of some debatable questions of territorial boundaries.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as our Constitution provides that treaties shall be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, do you think that it is constitutional for us to approve the Franco-American treaty which provides that before it goes into operation—or substantially, I would say, before it goes into operation—it must secure the approval of the council of the league of nations?

The PRESIDENT. Why, yes; we can consent. We have the sovereign right to consent to any process that we choose, surely.

Senator BRANDEGEE. We have the right to consent, but of course the Senate has the constitutional right to ratify the treaty, negotiated and presented by the Executive, but my point is, have we a right to provide that in addition to the constitutional requirements for the making of a valid treaty there shall also be required the consent of the council of the league of nations, which the Constitution was not aware of?

The PRESIDENT. If that is a part of the treaty; yes, I think we have.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But you do not think that the treaty can in any way amend the Constitution or the constitutional requirements for executing a treaty?

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Then by what process of ratiocination do you assume that the treaty can compel the consent of the council before this covenant is approved?

The PRESIDENT. Suppose you would determine that when any group of nations adopted a treaty then we could adopt the treaty that contained certain provisions that we wished to put in, and to make the operation of the treaty contingent upon its acceptance by the other nations in the group. It seems to me that that is an entirely analogous case. In other words, I am assuming that we adopt the treaty with Germany. In that case we will be members of the league. We are in effect saying that we have become members of the league. If the council of the league accepts this we agree to put it in force. It is a means of being consistent with the thing that we have already done in becoming a member of the league.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I get your viewpoint about that. Now, do you think it is wise for us to adopt the Franco-American treaty, which in substance provides that we can not denounce it until the council of the league of nations gives us permission to do so or agrees to denounce it?

The PRESIDENT. I do, Senator. I have a very strong feeling with regard to our historical relations with France, and also a very keen appreciation of her own sense of danger, and I think it would be one of the handsomest acts of history to enter into that.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I feel just as cordially toward her heroic conduct as anybody can. But that was not the question. The question was whether it was wise to so tie ourselves to any foreign nation as that we never could repudiate—I will not use the word "repudiate"—can never cancel our treaties without due notice, without the consent of a body not yet created.

The PRESIDENT. Of course I am assuming that body will be created before we adopt the Franco-American treaty, and in that case that provision that you are alluding to is only a completion of the idea of the treaty, namely, as I have been quoted as saying, this is an agreement on our part to anticipate the advice of the council of the league, as we shall take such and such measures to defend France. Inasmuch as we are anticipating that, we are assuming the action of the league, and therefore it is with the league and its action that the whole matter is bound up, and I think that the provision you allude to, therefore, is consistent and almost logically necessary.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, now, inasmuch as you have stated in your message—and I have of course agreed to it and have no doubt that it is true—that the Franco-American treaty is only designed for temporary purposes, the defense of France until the league says that it is competent to do it, or words to that effect——

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Would it not be the part of prudence for us to include in the Franco-American treaty, if it should be ratified, a provision that it shall have some time limit put upon it, that it shall exist for not more than 10 years, say? I assume if the league is ever going to be effective to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of its various members, it will be in the course of 10 years, and there is no objection to having some time limit on the treaty.

The PRESIDENT. Only a psychological objection, the sentiment between the two countries.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The other alternative is to guarantee it forever or until the council of the league loosens us from it, is it not?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; when the council of the league will exist, among other uses should be that the whole international influence that could be brought to bear for the management of all these things will be present there to bring about this rearrangement.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes; I understand that. But the fact that we have a vote to loose ourselves does not help us, as unanimous action is required by nine gentlemen, any one of whom can prevent us.

The PRESIDENT. No, Senator; but the diplomatic relations of the different countries in that council will be such, if I may judge, that those things may be accomplished.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is an optimistic view to take, if you will pardon my opinion about it.

The PRESIDENT. Perhaps it is.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I want to call your attention to the fact that this era of good feeling which exists between the allied and associated powers after their common experience and suffering in this great war may not always exist, in view of future commercial contests and separate interests of different nationalities which may occur in the future, and what some of us feel is that we ought to be careful in making these definite international engagements, which we are wisely determined to carry out in good faith if we should make them, and we feel that now is the time to understand exactly the obligations we are to be held to before we affix our signature, and I have no doubt that you agree to that.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I want to ask you a word or two about this so-called American draft. The American draft of the league which was sent to us in response to Senate resolution was the draft which was submitted by the American commission to the conference abroad?

The PRESIDENT. No.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It was the draft which was submitted by you as the head of the American commission to the American commission. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT. Why, Senator, it was done as all other things of this sort were done over there. We circulated the draft among the representatives of the 14 States who were represented in the general league of nations, and they had 10 days or more to examine it. I also submitted it to my colleagues, not for any formal discussion but in order to have their opinion if they chose to express it. Then when the commission got down to its real work they appointed a committee.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of the commission?

The PRESIDENT. No; of two officers of the commission. Well, they did form a committee, but that committee employed the services of two technical advisers. Mr. Miller was one of them and Mr. Hurst—not the Mr. Hurst that Mr. Miller mentioned.

Senator BRANDEGEE. He gave his initials as C. J. B.

The PRESIDENT. I have forgotten the initials.

Senator BRANDEGEE. He said he was an employee of the British State Department.

The PRESIDENT. Yes; he is a very able man. He was on the general drafting committee of the treaty, and Mr. Miller took the various documents that we have been reading and discussing and made a combined draft and it was that combined draft which was the subject of formal discussion and amendment and addition by the committee.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And that was the combined draft, the one that you sent to us the other day?

The PRESIDENT. No; Secretary Lansing was asked for it.

The CHAIRMAN. It was a composite draft. It came in yesterday.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I beg your pardon, I did not know about it. Was there any draft, no matter how incomplete, any skeleton draft or enumeration or substance for a draft for the so-called American plan for the covenant of the league of nations which you took with you from this country or was prepared over there by you?

The PRESIDENT. Only the one that I referred to earlier in this conference, Senator, when I had taken the Phillimore report as more or less of a basis of my work.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That was the only thing that you had in the nature of a skeleton draft when you left the country?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did the Phillimore draft or report, whatever the proper term may be, contain anything like what is now article 10 of the covenant of the league?

The PRESIDENT. I do not remember.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You do not remember whether there was anything like that in that?

The PRESIDENT. Let me say this in regard to article 10. I believe this to be a part of the history of it. It is so far as I am concerned. Early in my administration, as I think many of the members know, I tried to get the American States, the States of Central and South America, to join with us in an arrangement in which a phrase like this constituted the kernel, that we guaranteed to each other territorial integrity and political independence. "Under a republican form of government" was added in that case. But that is another matter. As I represented to them at that time, it was a desire on my part, at any rate, to show the way to them of keeping things steady and preventing the kind of aggression they have had.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the subject of the Niagara conference?

Senator BRANDEGEE. The A. B. C. powers.

The PRESIDENT. I do not think it was discussed there, Senator. We discussed it diplomatically.

The CHAIRMAN. It was taken up at that time?

The PRESIDENT. It was taken up at that time.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Who was the author of article 10?

The PRESIDENT. I suppose I was as much as anybody.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And you recommended it to your fellow American commissioners?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. How many Americans were on the commission which framed the covenant for the league of nations?

The PRESIDENT. Two—Col. House and myself.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The total membership was what? Fifteen, was it not?

The PRESIDENT. Fourteen nations, and five principal nations had two members, which would make 19, would it not? Yes, 19 members.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did they have the unit rule, so to speak, casting one vote for each member?

The PRESIDENT. In only one or two instances did we vote at all. I presided and the final form was this, "If there are no objections we will regard that as accepted."

Senator BRANDEGEE. As we say in the Senate, "without objection it is agreed to."

The PRESIDENT. Yes; and that is the way the whole thing was agreed to.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did these commissions to which the plenary conference delegated certain subjects to prepare reports upon have any coordination with each other? Did each commission know what the other commissions were doing?

The PRESIDENT. No; the subjects were too unlike.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Was there any debate on the completed draft of the covenant of the league of nations when it was submitted to the plenary council just before you came over in March?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; there were speeches.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not call those debates. I read that there were no debates as to what each particular government demanded.

The PRESIDENT. No; because there were so many of those represented, and they had all been canvassed in the process of formulation.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You replied to a resolution of the Senate requesting a copy of a letter of Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, which was also signed by Secretary Lansing——

The PRESIDENT. And Mr. White.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And Mr. White. You stated, if I recollect, in substance, that you would be glad to furnish us with a copy of it but for the fact that Gen. Bliss had mentioned the names of certain Governments and you thought it was a matter of delicacy not to make it public. Would it not be possible to furnish us with the general drift of the arguments, leaving out the names of the Governments, etc.?

The PRESIDENT. There was not any argument. He said flatly that it was unjust. It was not a reason.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It was an opinion.

The PRESIDENT. An opinion.

Senator BRANDEGEE. A conclusion.

Senator JOHNSON of California. With that, you agreed, Mr. President, did you not?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I do not think I ought to say any more than I have said.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not think I care to ask anything more.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Will you permit me to read into the record these two paragraphs from the conclusion of the treaty and ask whether they are what you refer to when you express the opinion that the treaty would go into effect when Germany and three of the contracting parties had signed it, and only as to them?

The CHAIRMAN. That is explicitly stated.

Senator HITCHCOCK. I thought it was left in some doubt. I would like to read them into the record [reading]:

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

I just wanted to make it clear that the treaty is not in effect except as to those that have ratified it.

The PRESIDENT. I could not put my hand on it, but I was sure.

Senator MCCUMBER. Mr. President, just one question on this French treaty. If we should adopt this present treaty with the league of nations and with section 10 in it, which brings all of the great nations of the league to the protection of France, if war should be made against her by Germany, what necessity is there for any other special treaty with France?

The PRESIDENT. To meet the possibility of delay in action on the part of the council of the league.

Senator MCCUMBER. But the agreement of section 10 comes into effect, does it not, the moment we adopt the treaty?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; but the council has to act and formulate its advice, and then the several governments have to act and form their judgment upon that advice.

Senator MCCUMBER. Do you not think under the present situation that that could be done as quickly as Germany could get ready for a second war on France?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, as quickly as she could get ready, yes; but not as quickly as she could act after she got ready.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the situation is this: If Germany has surrendered her navy, demobilized her army, and been shorn of large portions of her territory; if we have no demand for reparation or indemnity against her; if, as you stated in your addresses to the Congress, the war is over; if there is no fighting going on; if Germany has signed the peace treaty, and you have signed the peace treaty; if, in fact, there is a condition of peace, and only the joint resolution of Congress that a state of war existed a year ago—if that is all so, is there no way by which the condition of peace which actually exists can be made legally effective except by the adoption of the proposed treaty?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, I would say that there is no way which we ought to be willing to adopt which separates us, in dealing with Germany, from those with whom we were associated during the war.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Why?

The PRESIDENT. Because I think that is a moral union which we are not at liberty to break.

Senator BRANDEGEE. If we have rescued our fellow belligerents from the German peril voluntarily and without any charge, and if we prefer not to have any entanglements or connections with European powers, but to pursue our course as we did before the war, where is the moral obligation to merge ourselves with Europe forever?

The PRESIDENT. I do not construe it as merging ourselves, but I do think we are under the plainest moral obligation to join with our associates in imposing certain conditions of peace on Germany.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Even if we ratify the German so-called peace treaty, with or without the Shantung provision in it, and strike out article 1 of the peace treaty, the covenant of the league of nations, we still join with those with whom we have cooperated in establishing peace with Germany, do we not, and are at liberty to trade with her?

The PRESIDENT. An unworkable peace, because the league is necessary to the working of it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Well, suppose they have a league, and we ratify the treaty with the reservation that we are not bound by article 1, which is the covenant of the league—then they have a league of nations covenant.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, and we are tied into every other part of the treaty by reason of the fact that we are supposed to be members of the league of nations.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Suppose we also adopt the 21 amendments that Senator FALL has pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations, striking us out of these commissions to which we are tied, and just cutting the Gordian knot which ties us to the covenant: We establish peace with Germany just the same, I fancy. The other powers could accept our amendments to the treaty or not, as they chose. In either case Germany would be at peace, and they would be in the league, and we would be out of it. We could have peace and resume all our business in relation to copper mines and zinc mines, etc., and we could export to Germany, and reestablish the consular service, could we not?

The PRESIDENT. We could, sir; but I hope the people of the United States will never consent to do it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. There is no way by which the people can vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we not trading with Germany now, as a matter of fact?

The PRESIDENT. Not so far as I know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Licenses certainly have been issued. It is advertised in all the New York papers.

The PRESIDENT. We removed the restrictions that were formerly placed upon shipments to neutral countries which we thought were going through to Germany.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I see them advertised broadly in the New York papers.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, does the moral obligations to which you have alluded compel us to maintain American troops in Europe?

The PRESIDENT. Which moral obligation, Senator?

Senator JOHNSON of California. You referred to the moral obligation resting upon us to carry out the peace terms and the like in conjunction with our associates, and felt that it would be, as I understood you, a breaking, a denial of that moral obligation to make a separate peace or to act by ourselves.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Does that obligation go to the extent of compelling us to maintain American troops in Europe?

The PRESIDENT. Such small bodies as are necessary to the carrying out of the treaty, I think; yes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And will those troops have to be maintained under the various treaties of peace until the ultimate consummation of the terms of those treaties?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, Senator; but that is not long. In no case, as I remember, does that exceed 18 months.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I was rather under the impression that the occupation of Germany was to be for 15 years.

The PRESIDENT. Oh, I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. Along the Rhine.

The PRESIDENT. Along the Rhine; yes. I was thinking of Upper Silesia, and the other places where plebiscites are created, or to be carried out. It is the understanding with the other Governments that we are to retain only enough troops there to keep our flag there.

Senator JOHNSON of California. The idea in my mind was this: Will we be maintaining American troops upon the Rhine for the next 15 years?

The PRESIDENT. That is entirely within our choice, Senator; but I suppose we will.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Do you know, Mr. President, whether or not we have American troops in Budapest at present?

The PRESIDENT. We have not. There are some American officers there, Senator, sent with a military commission, but no American troops.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Returning, if you do not mind, Mr. President, to one last question about Shantung, do you recall the American experts reporting that the Japanese promise, the verbal promise, which has been referred to, to return Shantung, meant in reality the returning of the shell but retaining the kernel of the nut?

The PRESIDENT. I remember their saying that; yes, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. That is all.

The PRESIDENT. But I do not agree with them.

Senator NEW. Mr. President, if no one else has any questions to ask, I have a few.

The PRESIDENT. Proceed, Senator, if you will.

Senator NEW. These questions, Mr. President, are more or less general and haphazard, referring to no particular feature of the treaty, but to all of them.

First, was it the policy of the American delegates to avoid participation by the United States in strictly European questions and their settlement; and, if so, what were the matters in which America refused to participate, or endeavored to avoid participation?

The PRESIDENT. I could not give you a list in answer to the last part of your question, sir; but it certainly was our endeavor to keep free from European affairs.

Senator NEW. What did the American delegates say or do to secure nonparticipation by the United States in the cessions of Danzig, Memel, and in the various boundary commissions, reparations commissions, and other agencies set up in the treaty for the disposition of questions in which America has no national interest?

The PRESIDENT. I did not get that, Senator, it is so long.

Senator NEW. I will divide it. What did the American delegates say or do to secure nonparticipation by the United States in the cessions of Danzig and Memel?

The PRESIDENT. Why, Senator, the process of the whole peace was this: Each nation had associated with it certain expert advisers, college professors and bankers and men who were familiar with ethnical and geographical and financial and business questions. Each question was referred to a joint commission consisting of the specialists in that field representing the principal allied and associated powers. They made a report to this smaller council, and in every instance the American representatives were under instructions to keep out of actual participation in these processes so far as it was honorably possible to do so.

Senator NEW. The second half of the question is this: What did the American delegates do to secure nonparticipation by the United States in the reparations commission?

The PRESIDENT. Why, we were disinclined to join in that, but yielded to the urgent request of the other nations that we should, because they wanted our advice and counsel.

Senator NEW. What agreement, written or verbal, has been entered into by the American delegates touching the assignment to various States of mandatories under the provisions of article 22?

The PRESIDENT. None whatever.

Senator NEW. If it be understood that Great Britain or her dominions will act as mandatories of the territory in Africa lately held by Germany, what advantage of a practical nature is expected to accrue, and whom will it benefit, from subjecting the British or dominion administration to the mandatories of such nations as Liberia, Italy, or any others?

The PRESIDENT. Mandatories of Liberia?

Senator NEW. Yes.

The PRESIDENT. I do not understand, Senator. The whole system of mandates is intended for the development and protection of the territories to which they apply—that is to say, to protect their inhabitants, to assist their development under the operation of the opinion of the world, and to lead to their ultimate independent existence.

Senator NEW. Mr. President, it seems that there is more than a suspicion; there is a general conviction in the world, I think, that Germany is promoting the dissemination of Bolshevist propaganda in the countries of the Allies, including the United States. That being the case, I am prompted to ask what provision in the treaty obligates Germany to prohibit Bolshevik propaganda from German sources in the United States and allied countries?

The PRESIDENT. None.

Senator NEW. No provision? Was any proposal considered by the peace conference directed toward securing the names of German propaganda agents in the United States and the allied countries, or to obtain the records of the disbursements made in support of Bolshevik or other propaganda intended to weaken or disrupt the United States?

The PRESIDENT. We made every effort to trace everything that we got rumor of, Senator; and traced everything that we could; but no provisions were feasible in the treaty itself touching that.

Senator NEW. Did not France yield under pressure at least partly exerted by the American delegates to abandon certain guaranties of the security of her German frontiers which she had been advised by Marshal Foch were indispensable; and is not the present frontier, in French military opinion, less secure than the one which France was induced to abandon?

The PRESIDENT. Senator, do you think I ought to redebate here the fundamental questions that we debated at Paris? I think that would be a mistake, sir.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, it is on that very theory that I refrained from asking many of those things, the thoughts of which crowd one's mind, and which one would like to ask.

The PRESIDENT. Of course. You see, you are going into the method by which the treaty was negotiated. Now, with all respect, sir, I think that is a territory that we ought not to enter.

Senator NEW. Of course, if there is any reason why it should not be answered, I will withdraw it. Is there objection to answering this, Mr. President: What was France's solution proposed for administration of the Saar Basin?

The PRESIDENT. I do not think I ought to answer those questions, Senator, because of course they affect the policy and urgency of other Governments. I am not at liberty to go into that.

Senator NEW. Mr. President, would our position in the War of 1812 and the Spanish-American War have been secure under the league covenant?

The PRESIDENT. Oh, Senator, you can judge of that as well as I could. I have tried to be a historical student, but I could not quite get the league back into those days clearly enough in my mind to form a judgment.

Senator NEW. What would have been the procedure under the covenant in those two cases, in your opinion?

The PRESIDENT. Why, Senator, I could figure that out if you gave me half a day, because I would have to refresh my mind as to the circumstances that brought on the wars; but that has not been regarded as a profitable historical exercise—hypothetically to reconstruct history.

Senator NEW. Well, I do not want to press for answers, then.

Senator MOSES. Mr. President, under the terms of the treaty, Germany cedes to the principal allied and associated powers all of her overseas possessions?

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator MOSES. We thereby, as I view it, become possessed in fee of an undivided fifth part of those possessions.

The PRESIDENT. Only as one of five trustees, Senator. There is no thought in any mind of sovereignty.

Senator MOSES. Such possession as we acquire by means of that cession would have to be disposed of by congressional action.

The PRESIDENT. I have not thought about that at all.

Senator MOSES. You have no plan to suggest or recommendation to make to Congress?

The PRESIDENT. Not yet, sir; I am waiting until the treaty is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere in any way, but the conference has now lasted about three hours and a half, and it is half an hour after the lunch hour.

The PRESIDENT. Will not you gentlemen take luncheon with me? It will be very delightful.

(Thereupon, at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., the conference adjourned.)

DRAFT OF "COMPOSITE COVENANT" (S. DOC. NO. 74).

Mr. LODGE. I desire also to have printed in the RECORD and as a Senate document a covenant described to the committee by witnesses as a composite covenant. The President has sent in the draft of the American plan submitted to the commission on the league, and this is another draft, as I understand, made up by the legal advisers of the commission on the league. Mr. Millard, who represented the United States there, referred to it in his testimony. I ask that this draft of the covenant may be printed in the RECORD and as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"PREAMBLE.

"In order to secure international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to the use of armed force, by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, and in order to promote international cooperation, the powers signatory to this covenant adopt this constitution of the league of nations.

"ARTICLE 1.

"The action of the high contracting parties under the terms of this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of meetings of delegates representing the high contracting parties, of meetings at more frequent intervals of an executive council representing the States more immediately concerned in the matters under discussion, and of a permanent international secretariat to be established at the capital of the league.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Meetings of the body of delegates shall be held from time to time as occasion may require for the purpose of dealing with matters within the sphere of action of the league.

"Meetings of the body of delegates shall be held at the capital of the league or at such other place as may be found convenient and shall consist of not more than two representatives of each of the high contracting parties.

"An ambassador or minister of one of the high contracting parties shall be competent to act as its representative.

"All matters of procedure at meetings of the body of delegates, including the appointment of committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the body of delegates and may be decided by a majority of those present at the meeting.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The representatives of the States members of the league directly affected by matters within the sphere of action of the league will meet as an executive council from time to time, as occasion may require.

"The United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan shall be deemed to be directly affected by all matters within the sphere of action of the league. Invitations will be sent to any power whose interests are directely affected, and no decision taken at any meeting will be binding on a State which was not invited to be represented at the meeting.

"Such meetings will be held at whatever place may be decided on, or, failing any such decision, at the capital of the league, and any matter affecting the interests of the league or relating to matters within its sphere of action or likely to affect the peace of the world may be dealt with.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The permanent secretariat of the league shall be established at ———, which shall constitute the capital of the league. The secretariat shall comprise such secretaries and staff as may be required, under the general direction and control of a chancellor of the league, by whom they shall be appointed.

"The chancellor shall act as secretary at all meetings of the body of delegates or of the executive council.

"The expenses of the secretariat shall be borne by the States members of the league in accordance with the distribution among members of the Postal Union of the expenses of the International Postal Union.

"ARTICLE 5.

"Representatives of the high contracting parties and officials of the league, when engaged on the business of the league, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities, and the buildings occupied by the league or its officials or by representatives attending its meetings shall enjoy the benefits of extraterritoriality.

"ARTICLE 6.

"Admission to the league of States who are not signatories of this covenant requires the assent of not less than two-thirds of the body of delegates.

"No State shall be admitted to the league except on condition that its military and naval forces and armaments shall conform to standards prescribed by the league in respect of it from time to time.

"ARTICLE 7.

"The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league.

"ARTICLE 8.

"The high contracting parties recognize the principle that the maintenance of peace will require the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations; and the executive council shall formulate plans for effecting such reduction. It shall also inquire into the feasibility of abolishing compulsory military service and the substitution therefor of forces enrolled upon a voluntary basis and into the military and naval equipment which it is reasonable to maintain.

"The high contracting parties further agree that there shall be full and frank publicity as to all national armaments and military or naval programs.

"ARTICLE 9.

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the high contracting parties or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the league, and the high contracting parties reserve the right to take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"It is hereby also declared and agreed to be the friendly right of each of the high contracting parties to draw the attention of the body of delegates or of the executive council to any circumstances anywhere which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"ARTICLE 10.

"The high contracting parties agree that should disputes arise between them which can not be adjusted by the ordinary processes of diplomacy they will in no case resort to armed force without previously submitting the questions and matters involved either to arbitration or to inquiry by the executive council and until three months after the award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the executive council; and that they will not even then resort to armed force as against a member of the league which complies with the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the executive council.

"ARTICLE 11.

"The high contracting parties agree that whenever any dispute or difficulty shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration and will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered.

"ARTICLE 12.

"The executive council will formulate plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice and this court will be competent to hear and determine any matter which the parties recognize as suitable for submission to it for arbitration under the foregoing article.

"ARTICLE 13.

"If there should arise between States members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration as above, the high contracting parties agree that they will refer the matter to the executive council. Either party to the dispute may give notice to the chancellor of the existence of the dispute, and the chancellor will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof. For this purpose the parties agree to communicate to the chancellor statements of their case, with all the relevant facts and papers.

"Where the efforts of the council lead to the settlement of the dispute, a statement shall be prepared for publication indicating the nature of the dispute and the terms of settlement, together with such explanations as may be appropriate. If the dispute has not been settled, a report by the council shall be published setting forth with all necessary facts and explanations the recommendations which the council think just and proper for the settlement of the dispute. If the report is unanimously agreed to by the members of the council other than the parties to the dispute, the high contracting parties agree that none of them will go to war with any party which complies with its recommendations. If no such unanimous report can be made, it shall be the duty of the majority to issue a statement indicating what they believe to be the facts and containing the recommendations which they consider to be just and proper.

"The executive council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the body of delegates. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute. In any case referred to the body of delegates all the provisions of this article relating to the action and powers of the executive council shall apply to the action and powers of the body of delegates.

"ARTICLE 14.

"Should any of the high contracting parties be found by the league to have broken or disregarded its covenants under article 10, it shall thereby ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other members of the league, which shall immediately subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention, so far as possible, of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

"It shall be the duty of the executive council in such a case to recommend what effective military or naval force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

"The high contracting parties agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the high contracting parties who are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

"ARTICLE 15.

"In the event of disputes between one State member of the league and another State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league, the high contracting parties agree that the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to become ad hoc members of the league, and upon acceptance of any such invitation the above provisions shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the league.

"Upon such invitation being given the executive council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances and merits of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

"In the event of a power so invited refusing to become ad hoc a member of the league, and taking any action against a State member of the league which in the case of a State member of the league would constitute a breach of article 10, the provisions of article 14 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

"If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to become ad hoc members of the league, the executive council may take such action and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

"ARTICLE 16.

"The high contracting parties entrust to the league the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest.

"ARTICLE 17.

"The high contracting parties agree that in respect of territories which formerly belonged to the German Empire or to Turkey and which are inhabited by peoples unable at present to secure for themselves the benefits of a stable administration, the well-being of these peoples constitutes a sacred trust for civilization, and imposes upon the States members of the league the obligation to render help and guidance in the development of the administration. They recognize that all policies of administration or economic development should be based primarily upon the well-considered interests of the peoples themselves, upon the maintenance of the policy of the open door, and of equal opportunity for all the high contracting parties in respect of the use and development of the economic resources of the territory. No military or naval forces shall be formed among the inhabitants of the territories in excess of those required for purposes of defense and of internal police.

"ARTICLE 18.

"The high contracting parties will work to establish and maintain fair hours and humane conditions of labor for all those within their several jurisdictions, and they will exert their influence in favor of the adoption and maintenance of a similar policy and like safeguards wherever their industrial and commercial relations extend. Also they will appoint commissions to study conditions of industry and labor in their international aspects and to make recommendations thereon, including the extension and improvement of existing conventions.

"ARTICLE 19.

"The high contracting parties agree that they will make no law prohibiting or interfering with the free exercise of religion, and that they will in no way discriminate, either in law or in fact, against those who practice any particular creed, religion, or belief whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

"ARTICLE 20.

"The high contracting parties will agree upon provisions intended to secure and maintain freedom of transit and just treatment for the commerce of all States members of the league.

"ARTICLE 21.

"The high contracting parties agree that any treaty or international engagement entered into between States, members of the league, shall be forthwith registered with the chancellor, and as soon as possible published by him.

"ARTICLE 22.

"The high contracting parties severally agree that the present covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations inter se which are inconsistent with the terms hereof, and solemnly engage that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms hereof.

"In case any of the powers signatory hereto or subsequently admitted to the league shall, before becoming a party to this covenant, have undertaken any obligations which are inconsistent with the terms of this covenant, it shall be the duty of such power to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations."

MILITARY OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE (S. DOC. NO. 75).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have in my hand an agreement between the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, and France and Germany with regard to the military occupation of the territories of the Rhine, signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919. It may have appeared in the newspapers, but it has not caught my eye, and has never been sent to the Senate so far as I am aware. It is a part of the treaty with Germany now pending. I have here a photostat copy of the British print, which was submitted to the House of Commons, and as this seems to be the only way of obtaining it, and as it really forms an integral part of the treaty with Germany, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD and also as a document. It contains 13 articles relating to the Rhine Provinces. I am aware that American interests in those Provinces may not be very immedite; but as under the treaty with Germany we shall keep troops there for 15 years, I think, perhaps, it is well that we should have the protocol before us while we are considering the treaty with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire it printed as a Senate document or as a public document?

Mr. LODGE. I wish to have it printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, BELGIUM, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, AND FRANCE, OF THE ONE PART, AND GERMANY, OF THE OTHER PART, WITH REGARD TO THE MILITARY OCCUPATION OF THE TERRITORIES OF THE RHINE.

"The undersigned, acting under the powers conferred upon them by their respective Governments, have come to the following agreement as provided for in article 432 of the treaty of peace of even date:

"ARTICLE 1.

"In accordance with article 428 and the following articles of the treaty of even date, the armed forces of the allied and associated powers will continue in occupation of German territory (as such occupation is defined by article 5 of the armistice convention of November 11, 1918, as extended by article 7 of the additional convention of January 16, 1919) as a guaranty of the execution by Germany of the treaty.

"No German troops, except prisoners of war in process of repatriation, shall be admitted to the occupied territories, even in transit; but police forces of a strength to be determined by the allied and associated powers may be maintained in these territories for the purpose of insuring order.

"ARTICLE 2.

"There shall be constituted a civilian body styled the inter-allied Rhineland high commission, and hereinafter called the high commission, which, except in so far as the treaty may otherwise provide, shall be the supreme representative of the allied and associated powers within the occupied territory. It shall consist of four members representing Belgium, France, Great Britain, and the United States.

"ARTICLE 3.

"(a) The high commission shall have the power to issue ordinances so far as may be necessary for securing the maintenance, safety, and requirements of the allied and associated forces. Such ordinances shall be published under the authority of the high commission, and copies thereof shall be sent to each of the allied and associated Governments and also to the German Government.

"When so published they shall have the force of law and shall be recognized as such by all the allied and associated military authorities and by the German civil authorities.

"(b) The members of the high commission shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

"(c) The German courts shall continue to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction subject to the exceptions contained in paragraphs (d) and (e) below.

"(d) The armed forces of the allied and associated powers and the persons accompanying them, to whom the general officers commanding the armies of occupation shall have issued a revocable pass, and any persons employed by or in the service of such troops shall be exclusively subject to the military law and jurisdiction of such forces.

"(e) Any person who commits any offense against the persons or property of the armed forces of the allied and associated powers may be made amenable to the military jurisdiction of the said forces.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The German authorities, both in the occupied and in the unoccupied territories, shall, on the demand of any duly authorized military officer of the occupying forces, arrest and hand over to the nearest commander of the allied or associated troops any person charged with an offense who is amenable under paragraph (d) or paragraph (e) of article 3 above to the military jurisdiction of the allied or associated forces.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The civil administration of the provinces (Provinzen), Government departments (Regierungsbezirke), urban circles (Stadtkreise), rural circles (Landkreise), and communes (Gemeinde), shall remain in the hands of the German authorities, and the civil administration of these areas shall continue under German law and under the authority of the central German Government, except in so far as it may be necessary for the high commission by ordinance under article 3 to adapt that administration to the needs and circumstances of military occupation. It is understood that the German authorities shall be obliged, under penalty of removal, to conform to the ordinances issued in virtue of article 3 above.

"ARTICLE 6.

"The right to requisition in kind and to demand services in the manner laid down in The Hague convention, 1907, shall be exercised by the allied and associated armies of occupation.

"The charges for the requisitions effected in the zone of each allied and associated army and the estimate of damage caused by the troops of occupation shall be determined by local commissions composed in equal representation of German civilians appointed by the German civil authorities and allied or associated military officers, and presided over by some person appointed by the high commission.

"The German Government shall continue to be responsible for the cost of maintenance of the troops of occupation under the conditions fixed by the treaty. The German Government shall also be responsible for the costs and expenses of the high commission and for its housing. Suitable premises for the housing of the high commission shall be selected after consultation with the German Government.

"ARTICLE 7.

"The allied and associated troops shall continue undisturbed in possession of any premises at present occupied by them, subject to the provision of article 8 (b) below.

"ARTICLE 8.

"(a) The German Government shall undertake, moreover, to place at the disposal of the allied and associated troops and to maintain in good state of repair all the military establishments required for the said troops, with the necessary furniture, heating and lighting, in accordance with the regulations concerning these matters in force in the various armies concerned. These shall include accommodation for officers and men, guard rooms, offices, administrative, regimental, and staff headquarters, workshops, storerooms, hospitals, laundries, regimental schools, riding schools, stables, training grounds, and rifle and artillery ranges, aviation grounds, grazing grounds, warehouses for supplies and grounds for military maneuvers, also theater and cinema premises, and reasonable facilities for sport and for recreation grounds for the troops.

"(b) Private soldiers and noncommissioned officers shall be accommodated in barracks, and shall not be billeted on the inhabitants, except in cases of exceptional emergency.

"In the event of the existing military establishments being insufficient or not being considered suitable, the allied and associated troops may take possession of any other public or private establishment, with its personnel, suitable for those purposes, or if there are no such suitable premises, they may require the construction of new barracks.

"Civilian and military officers and their families may be billeted on the inhabitants in accordance with the billeting regulations in force in each army.

"ARTICLE 9.

"No German direct taxes or duties will be payable by the high commission, the allied and associated armies, or their personnel.

"Food supplies, arms, clothing, equipment, and provisions of all kinds for the use of the allied and associated armies, or addressed to the military authorities, or to the high commission, or to canteens and officers' messes shall be transported free of charge and free of all import duties of any kind.

"ARTICLE 10.

"The personnel employed on all means of communication (railways, railroads, and tramways of all kinds, waterways (including the Rhine), roads and rivers), shall obey any orders given by or on behalf of the commander in chief of the allied and associated armies for military purposes.

"All the material and all the civil personnel necessary for the maintenance and working of all means of communication must be kept intact on all such means of communication in the occupied territory.

"The transport on the railways of troops or individual soldiers or officers on duty or furnished with a warrant will be effected without payment.

"ARTICLE 11.

"The armies of occupation may continue to use for military purposes all existing telegraphic and telephonic installations.

"The armies of occupation shall also have the right to continue to install and use military telegraph and telephone lines, wireless stations and all other similar means of communication which may appear to them expedient. For this purpose, subject to the approval of the high commission, they may enter upon and occupy any land, whether public or private.

"The personnel of the public telegraph and telephone services shall continue to obey the orders of the commander in chief of the allied and associated armies given for military purposes.

"Telegrams and messages to or from the allied and associated authorities and the high commission and of an official nature shall be entitled to priority over all other communications and shall be dispatched free of charge. The allied and associated military authorities shall have the right to supervise the order in which such communications are transmitted.

"No wireless telegraphy installations shall be allowed to be erected by the authorities or by the inhabitants of the occupied territory without previous authorization by the allied and associated military authorities.

"ARTICLE 12.

"The personnel of the postal services shall obey any orders given by or on behalf of the commander in chief of the allied and associated armies for military purposes. The public postal service shall continue to be carried out by the German authorities, but this shall not in any way affect the retention of the military postal services organized by the armies of occupation, who shall have the right to use all existing postal routes for military requirements.

"The said armies shall have the right to run postal wagons with all necessary personnel on all existing postal routes.

"The German Government shall transmit free of charge and without examination letters and parcels which may be entrusted to its post offices by or for the armies of occupation or by or for the high commission; and shall be responsible for the value of any letters or parcels lost.

"ARTICLE 13.

"The high commission shall have the power, whenever they think it necessary, to declare a state of siege in any part of the territory or in the whole of it. Upon such declaration the military authorities shall have the powers provided in the German Imperial law of May 30, 1892.

"In case of emergency, where public order is disturbed or threatened in any district, the local military authorities shall have the power to take such temporary measures as may be necessary for restoring order. In such case the military authorities shall report the facts to the high commission.

"Done at Versailles, the 28th day of June, 1919."

LETTER FROM CHARLES F. TUTTLE.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have received a communication from Charles F. Tuttle, of Brooklyn, N. Y., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., August 9, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The statement of Senator KENYON, recently reported in the public press, to the effect that the packers were opposing his bill through propaganda, impels me to call the subject to your attention.

When such revolutionary legislation is proposed in the United States Senate, affecting any large industry, is it to be expected that because it includes a few industries only our business world will regard the matter as wholly unimportant? With the result of governmental operation of our transportation and wire lines prominently before us how can business men in all walks refrain from urging their representatives in Congress to go no further along such lines.

The legislation under which the rail and wire lines have been operated for a period by the Government, related to those utilities only, but the legislation touched every branch of business and every consumer. It reached us directly in two important ways; in poor service and in greatly increased expense. To now propose that the meat industry of this Nation shall be in any degree directed by governmental authority is of immediate concern to every employer of labor and to every consumer.

Employers are now struggling with the wage problem and considering every possible means to reduce costs all along the line in a safe and proper manner with a minimum of disturbance. It seems to be now universally conceded that the promised economies of governmental operation of rails and wires are not to be had, for reasons that were foretold by some of us and which are now apparent to all.

One glance at comparative operating costs has shown the business world the frightful expense of the experiment. Instead of the savings that theorists promised us we find a staggering, almost unbelievable, cost increase. There is no escape from the conclusion that the consumer is now paying heavily for legislation which, on its face, did not include him.

To now propose similar experiments with such an industry as meat, naturally produces thousands of protests. In the light of recent experiences it is small wonder that our citizens protest to their Congressmen against such legislation.

Senator KENYON'S bill, and the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission, respecting the packing industry are so fundamentally wrong that if carried out would inevitably lead to markedly increased operating costs and hence to higher meat prices. More than this, such legislation is wholly unnecessary.

Noticing in the newspapers accounts of the activities of Mr. Francis J. Heney, as counsel for the Federal Trade Commission in its inquiry into the packing industry, I procured the first and second volumes of the Trade Commission's report of those proceedings, and have written for the third volume, which the newspapers state has recently come from the press.

Upon carefully reading this report I am impressed with the marked difference between the general statements of the report, in which the packers are charged with unlawful acts, and the testimony or evidence in support of such charges.

Such differences are so many in number as to preclude specifically pointing them out in this letter, but I can not resist calling your attention to one instance; the commission repeatedly charges that there has been no time since 1885 when the packers were not illegally combined in some way, and yet by the same report we are informed that the packers were brought to the bar of a Federal criminal court of justice and the verdict of the jury was "not guilty."

In the absence of explanation, such as that the trial judge rebuked the jury because their verdict was contrary to the evidence or that the verdict should be set aside because of newly discovered evidence, I feel very strongly that the defendants in that case are entitled to the verdict of the jury.

Further, the Federal Trade Commission in its report repeatedly states, in one form or another, that the incontrovertible proofs of the numerous illegal acts of the packers are in the hands of the commission and are set forth in the report.

In view of the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by the act creating it, the inquiry naturally arises why the commission does not cite one or all of the packers in a proceeding before it on behalf of the public. The testimony could be quickly taken and the aggrieved party could take the cause to the circuit court of appeals, where it could be speedily determined.

We are further told that in proceedings on a bill in equity brought by the Federal Government against the chief packers an injunction was issued which is as broad as the Sherman Antitrust Act. The Federal Trade Commission can present all its testimony and evidence of wrongdoing on the part of the packers to that Federal court in an application to punish the packers for contempt, and the full and real value of all the facts in the possession of the Federal Trade Commission can be speedily determined The power of that Federal court to punish for contempt is broader than its power to sentence under any of the so-called antitrust acts.

From the commission's report I further learn that the packers are charged with using a "uniform method of cost accounting." I stand aghast, because I have before me a pamphlet dated January, 1916, issued by the Federal Trade Commission, entitled "Helpful Activities to Strengthen American Business."

I also have before me the printed address of Mr. Edward N. Hurley before the Boston Commercial Club on March 28, 1916. The address was printed and distributed by the Washington Government Printing Office and was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 20, 1916, by Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN, of Massachusetts. It would unduly extend this letter to quote copiously from these pamphlets.

One of the outstanding points in both pamphlets is that the Federal Trade Commission indorses standard systems of cost accounting, and that the commission offers to assist in devising standard systems, either at the request of individual merchants and manufacturers or through associations that represent any particular industry. The commission points out that it has for this work an adequate force of experienced accountants and tenders their service to various lines of industry.

Moreover, in the public press numerous accounts have appeared of similar addresses made by representatives of the Federal Trade Commission to gatherings of manufacturers engaged in one line of production, notably before the manufacturers of bathtubs and pottery, a year or so ago, in Washington, D. C., and it should here be noted that the bathtub people, not so many years earlier, were indicted under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I recall reading in the public press accounts of public addresses by President Wilson, in which the work of the Federal Trade Commission in this particular matter was approved of, and I also read in the press a letter purporting to be from President Wilson to Mr. Hurley, the then chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, applauding the work he was doing along this very line.

Applying the "deadly parallel," we find in one column the Federal Trade Commission, the chairman of that commission, and the President of the United States pointing out the benefits, not only to the producer, but to the consumer, to be had from uniform systems of cost accounting, and tendering the services of that commission in devising for various lines of industry such uniform methods of cost accounting, and in the other column charging the use of same to be a crime and punishable under the law.

I fully appreciate that we are passing through a most trying period, but our passage will not be made easier by giving to the Federal Trade Commission, or any other governmental authority, any powers of direct or indirect interference with the actual management of any large business undertaking, and particularly of one so large as the meat industry.

If our National Government desires to be parental to the small meat packer, let is assist him by furnishing him with refrigeration cars, and with refrigeration storage in large centers of population. In point of fact, he would not be so helped, but the experiment has one great advantage, namely, it would not appreciably add to the cost of our previous experiments in such matters.

My letter is already a long one, but I can not refrain from calling your attention to one angle of this charge of uniform method of cost accounting. The newspapers tell us that the packers, under rules of the United States Food Administration, were required to so conduct their meat food business that their profits therefrom should amount to not more than 9 per cent on the capital employed, or not in excess of 2½ cents for each dollar's worth of goods sold.

In view of the enormous volume of the meat food business during the war, how could any class of manufacturers follow such a rule of the United States Food Administration without having some form of cost accounting that would enable our National Government to check up the results? Could such method of accountings be otherwise than standardized? Would that not be one of the very first and most important matters to be carefully standardized so as to prevent misunderstandings and to make the results easily understandable?

I assume that the Government has been active in this very particular, because from the annual report Food Administration, for the year ended November 2, 1918, I take the following statement of the volume, investments, and results from operations in the meat departments of the so-called "Big Five," viz, Armour, Cudahy, Morris, Swift, and Wilson:

For year ended Nov. 2, 1918.

Total profit	$40,594,935
Investment	$714,187,204
Profit percentage on investment	5.6
Sales	$2,434,113,430
Profit percentage on sales	1.6

Parenthetically, are the per cents just named to be classed as profiteering? I know of no successful line of business activity which did not earn much larger returns.

It is claimed that evidence of agreements as to wholesale meat selling prices is found in the fact that Armour's prices do not vary greatly from Cudahy's, etc. In view of the very small margin of profit shown in the above-mentioned report, how can wholesale prices vary greatly, unless some one is willing to sell at a loss?

Let me add that if we strike from the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the packing industry the adverbs, adjectives, and expletives, we will find nothing unlawful.

We need no further laws respecting this matter; all we need is intelligent enforcement of the laws already on the statute books.

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. F. TUTTLE.

EFFECT OF TREATY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie on the table. I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who gave notice that he was going to address the Senate to-day, has postponed his address; and as I gave notice several days ago that, with the permission of the Senate, I would discuss the resolution that I have now offered, I will, if there is no objection, follow the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who, I understand, intends to speak this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 168) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That when the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, now pending in the Senate, that it be done with and in consideration of the following understanding as to the present and future construction and interpretation to be given to the treaty:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by any member of the league, as provided in article 1, the Government giving such notice shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying into effect the obligations of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of military or naval forces or economic measures, can only be carried out through the voluntary separate action of each of the respective Governments, members of the league, and that the failure of any such Government to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures shall not constitute a moral or legal violation of the treaty.

3. That all domestic and political questions relating to the internal affairs of a Government which is a member of the league, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, and commerce are solely within the jurisdiction of such Government, and are not by the covenant of the league of nations submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or assembly or the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power. If a dispute arises between parties with regard to a question other than those which are herein specifically exempted as domestic questions, and it is claimed by one of the parties that such question is a domestic and political question, relating to its internal affairs, then the council shall not consider or make recommendations thereon, except upon the unanimous vote of the council other than the representatives of the disputants.

4. There shall not be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision of the said treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether he proposes those clauses which the Secretary has just read to the Senate to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification or not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not. My purpose is to have the resolution considered as soon as possible, and passed, if possible, in advance of action on the treaty, so that the other nations that will have representation upon the council of the league of nations may have an opportunity to pass the identical resolution or one with the same purport. I intended to discuss that question and will discuss it after the Senator from Illinois has concluded his address.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The reason why I asked the question was because, as nearly as I could follow the language as the Secretary read it, it provided that when the Senate acted upon the ratification of the treaty of Versailles these things should be understood.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And I did not know whether or not the Senator meant that these things were to be incorporated and passed by the Senate in a separate resolution from the resolution of ratification of the treaty. I understand that his plan is to have a separate resolution of the Senate passed after the treaty is ratified?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have been urging for some time, as the Senator knows, the incorporation in a separate resolution of such reservations as the Senate might desire or might think proper to make. I suggested once before that the resolution be contemporaneous with the ratification of the treaty, but not a part of it, for the reasons that I then stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator mean by "contemporaneous, but not a part of it"? Before or after the action upon the resolution of ratification?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not consider that that makes any legal difference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; but whether it makes a difference or not, what does the Senator propose about it—that we shall act upon the resolution of ratification before adopting the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is my suggestion that we adopt this resolution now, and I intend to state the reasons why I favor that plan.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I understand that. I mean, after this resolution has been adopted, if it should be adopted, by the Senate, then in what resolution does the Senator propose to embody the instructions carried in this resolution?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is the opinion of the Senator from Nevada that if the plan which he has in mind is carried out, there will be nothing else required except the regular form of resolution for ratifying treaties.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nevada, in regard to the resolution which he has just introduced, if he is of the opinion that the passage of a resolution by the Senate would have the effect of canceling or repealing or amending the covenant of the league of nations once it had been adopted? In order to explain——

Mr. PITTMAN. I may answer that by "no."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, I will ask the Senator further what effect he would claim the passage of the resolution which he has proposed would have, for this reason: It presupposes that there is a covenant of the league of nations, and that it has been ratified. The covenant of the league of nations expressly provides, in article 16, that every international dispute shall be decided first by the council, and then by the body of delegates. "Every international dispute" includes disputes about the tariff, it includes disputes about immigration, it includes disputes about everything. Now, the Senator's resolution provides that the council and the assembly of the league of nations shall not have jurisdiction to pass on certain kinds of disputes. In other words, he suggests that we should ratify the league of nations, which provides that they shall have jurisdiction; and after it has been ratified the Senator would pass a resolution that they shall not have jurisdiction. If it is to have any effect at all, it must be by way of an amendment or repeal of the league of nations.

There is this further consideration in that connection: Article 23 of the covenant of the league of nations expressly provides that the league of nations shall have supervision of the foreign trade of the United States in arms and ammunition. The Senator's resolution would seek to take away from the league of nations supervision of the foreign trade of the United States in arms and ammunition, or any dispute between this country and another country relating to that. If it has that effect, it must be by way of amendment of the league of nations; and yet I understand the Senator to admit that it could not have that effect.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], because he gave notice that he would speak to-day; and yet the Senator requires me to answer briefly.

There are two kinds of questions involved in the treaty. One kind involves a moral obligation, and the other kind involves a legal obligation. A moral obligation is one that is left solely to the determination of the party to be bound by it. A legal obligation may be determined in accordance with the covenant by the members of the council or the other body provided.

As far as our moral obligations are concerned, we may protect ourselves against any complaint or any cause of complaint as to the manner in which we act in determining our moral obligations by simply giving notice in advance of the construction that we are going to place upon the treaty and how we are going to act.

As to the legal obligations under the treaty, such as the Senator has suggested, dealing with domestic questions and the Monroe doctrine, I propose that a resolution identical with that which we pass be passed by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, who, with the United States, will constitute a permanent majority of the council, to which all these matters are to be and will be submitted, if they are subject to submission. If those countries do adopt the same resolution that we do, pledging themselves in advance to the same construction that we do, then we know that that construction will be given by the council whenever the question arises. It constitutes a moral understanding among the Governments that will control the league and avoids the necessity for us to renew negotiations of our contract relations with Germany and other countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the covenant of the league of nations in article 23 pledges the United States—obligates the United States, I believe the word is—to provide for the free transit of the commerce of all members of the league. I presume that that is a development of the declaration of the President in the third point of his famous 14 points of peace, in which he laid down as one of the bases of peace that the nations associating themselves together for peace will agree to the removal of economic barriers. Does the Senator from Nevada claim that when the United States by the ratification of this covenant obligates itself, in compact with the other nations, in setting up the constitution for the league to provide for the free transit of the commerce of the other members of the league, it is what he calls only a moral obligation?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; for the purpose of distinction I call that a legal obligation, and that will not be reached by a separate resolution except in the manner I have described; that is, by the majority of the council adopting a construction that we desire, and when they adopt that construction then it will have the same effect as if an amendment were made to the treaty, and avoid all the long delays that are consequent upon the amendment of a treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, as I understand the Senator from Nevada, some of the obligations which we assume under this covenant are moral obligations and some of them are legal obligations.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator probably has grasped my idea.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Article 10 obligates the United States to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of the other members of the league.

Mr. PITTMAN. Which is a moral obligation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a moral obligation?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How does the Senator draw a distinction between the moral obligation of article 10 and the legal obligation of article 23 when they are expressed in practically the same language?

Mr. PITTMAN. The distinction is this, as I take it: In article 10 we undertake to do certain things when certain conditions arise. There is no power granted to any instrumentality to assist us in forming our judgment or interfering with our judgment when it is formed. What we find there is that when we determine that an external aggression is being committed against the territorial integrity of a country, then we have a moral obligation to do something. If we find, however, that in our judgment there is no such aggression against the territorial integrity of a country, that judgment of ours is not reviewable by any other power under the covenant of the league. Therefore it is a moral obligation, because there is no legal power to determine the cause or enforce it, but it partakes of the nature of a legal obligation when the determination is participated in, under fixed rules, by another body than the country to be bound by the decision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not a distinction between two kinds of obligations, moral and legal. That is a matter of the interpretation of the meaning of the article of the covenant, and when it has been interpreted in its application to mean that there has been an infringement upon the territorial integrity of one member of the league, then the Senator would be compelled to admit that the obligation of the United States to intervene to protect the territorial integrity was legal as well moral.

Mr. PITTMAN. If our Government determined the obligation to exist it would then be its duty to fulfill the obligation in such manner as it might determine proper.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, please. Undoubtedly if article 10 provided that when it was determined by the council that there was an external aggression against territory, then each of the Governments should be compelled to do certain things, it would transfer it from a moral obligation to a legal obligation, because the judgment then would rest in a court or a body of decision. But the way the article is now drawn it does not rest in the council; it does not rest in the assembly of the league of nations or any other Government; it rests solely in the judgment of our Government, and when a thing rests in the judgment of the person who is charged with the wrong, then it must be a moral obligation instead of a legal obligation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I notice that the Senator from Nevada adopts the language, to a large extent, and the attitude that were adopted by the President as reported in the conference of yesterday.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know of no higher authority.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is very high authority, especially as indicating the intention of the representatives of the United States in the framing of the covenant of the league of nations.

In that connection I would say that it seems to me the statement of the Senator from Nevada and the statement of the President, that the element of judgment is to be involved in the enforcement of the obligations of this covenant, does not affect the nature of the obligation, but simply is a question of the determination of a fact as to whether or not the condition had arisen when the obligation would come into effect.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would like to yield the floor, but not because I do not want to debate this matter. I am going to debate it in about an hour, as soon as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] gets through with his address, and I shall then be very glad to debate it all the afternoon if no one stops the debate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is just one other question I would like to ask the Senator from Nevada before he takes his seat, and then I will conclude. The Senator and the President being agreed that the putting into effect of article 10 and, as I understood the President's statement, of other articles of the league of nations rests entirely within the judgment of the United States, which is equivalent to saying within the discretion of the United States, that it is a mere moral obligation, which is equivalent to saying that the covenant of the league of nations shall have no effect upon the United States unless the United States in its judgment, when the particular occasion arises, should agree to it, is the Senator from Nevada willing that that declaration shall be incorporated in the resolution of ratification of the covenant?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am unwilling for the Senator from Washington to make a statement with regard to what the President said which is inaccurate, and then proceed afterwards to answer another question. I know the Senator does not intend to have me construed that way, but it is only his peculiar way of asking questions. As a matter of fact, the record is here, now, of what the President said with regard to these resolutions. In discussing article 1, with regard to withdrawals, he attempted to sustain the position, and I think he did sustain it very clearly, that there was only a moral obligation upon us to satisfy our obligations before leaving the league. I think he satisfied nearly all that they could find no legal, as distinguished from moral, obligation in article 10. Now, in discussing particular articles I do not remember that he differentiated with regard to any other article than article 1 and article 10. I do know that he said that as far as the article regarding the Monroe doctrine is concerned and the article covering our domestic affairs is concerned, the other Governments who participated in the framing of the treaty hold the same view that he holds with regard to the interpretation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. And that is that domestic questions that are now recognized as domestic, and internal questions under international law, are outside of the jurisdiction of the league.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Nevada whether he will permit me to interrupt him.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will, although I did not know that I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. OWEN. The Chair announced that the Senator from Nevada has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has had the floor right along.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to complete this question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will let the question be asked and then yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I will no longer make the effort.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not know I had the floor, and I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I notice in the report of the conference yesterday a very interesting statement from the President, who, as the Senator says, is very high authority, that when it comes to the question of determining the mandatories under the covenant—that is, the question of determining what mandate shall be given to the members of the league, and particularly, of interest to us, what mandate shall be given to the United States, as to what part of the world the United States shall become a trustee or guardian of in the character of a mandatory—the President says that the league of nations will decide that question. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Nevada of it?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I did not understand the President to say that, and there are a great many things the President said which I think, if you will read carefully, there might be a chance for you to make an error on. I think it would be far better if, instead of attempting to quote the President with regard to a matter which the Senator did not hear personally, he would read from the record those statements. I did not understand the President to take, and I am perfectly confident that he did not take the position that the council of the league of nations could determine the mandatories. In fact, I am perfectly positive the President realized that a mandatory can not be forced upon any nation but that its acceptance of it is entirely voluntary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The question was asked the President of what country the United States would be mandatory, and the answer of the President was that the league of nations would determine that. There were some very skillful stenographers there, and their report seems to be accurate. Of course, I may be entirely mistaken, but——

Mr. PITTMAN. I know it is not correct.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is quite interesting to know whether or not that is the purpose and plan of those who have been principally connected with the framing of this document, that the burdens of government in distant parts of the world, such as Constantinople and Armenia, are to be placed upon the United States by edict of the league of nations and not by the American Government nor the American people.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator need not be uneasy. There is no such provision in the treaty, and no one except those who are opposed to the treaty and the league of nations have ever urged any such construction.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I want to ask a question, not for the purpose of getting into an argument, but for the purpose of getting the Senator's view on one question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought I had yielded the floor, and the Senator from Oklahoma having risen to ask me a question after I had been seated, I am afraid he may have thought I treated him with discourtesy. I certainly want him to be assured that I did not, and I would rather yield to him first and have him take the floor.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator from Oklahoma had some other matter to present.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator from Nevada for the explanation. I wanted to call his attention to what the phraseology, legal and moral, in our language refers to. Where you can under a contract enforce it by a court, you have a legal obligation and an enforcible one, and where it is a moral obligation there is no tribunal with authority to dispose of it.

The Supreme Court of the United States have found that all treaties were subject to repeal by a succeeding Congress or by the same Congress. Therefore all treaties in their obligations are of a moral character and should be so regarded. There is no power in the world that could coerce the United States to make it carry out a legal obligation. If the United States became an outlaw nation, all the nations of the world might coerce it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I have yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to say to the Senator from Nevada just one word. The Constitution of the United States provides that a treaty of the United States, instead of being a mere moral obligation, is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I have yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to one fact in connection with this discussion. The Supreme Court of the United States have time and again decided that a treaty can be repealed by an act of Congress. If that is the case, if an act of Congress can repeal any treaty, what is left but the moral obligation of the treaty?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nevada a question, not to get into a debate. The Senator has been very patient. I understand the Senator's position to be that as now drawn certain of the clauses of the league covenant are moral obligations only because there is no court or tribunal created to decide questions of fact or to enter any kind of a decree of enforcement. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PITTMAN. Those are part of the essentials of legal responsibility. There are other elements that go to the definition of legal responsibility.
